The hero of the day was Kirkland, whose hustle brought the crowd to its feet more than once. Late in the second half, with UMass holding a slim 65–59 lead, Kirkland dove to the ground for a rebound, and then hustled back up the floor to save an errant UMass. Kirkland, well known for his athleticism, jumped in front of the scorers table, and with his back to the floor threw the ball back in play to Clarke to save the possession. Kirkland also provided a highlight–reel dunk at the 5:37 mark to give Massachusetts a 65–54 lead.

"He was down in the trenches," said Clarke of Kirkland. "He scrapped for every ball. We need someone to step up every night, [and] he's been that guy."

LaSalle center K'Zell Wesson was a force in the first half, scoring 14 points and pulling down eight rebounds. LaSalle had the UMass lead to two, 33–31, before an 8–0 run gave Massachusetts a 41–31 halftime lead. Ketner hit two straight field goals, and Kirkland delivered a basket before Clarke ended the half with a floater as time expired.

UM men keep on winning

By Corey Peter Goodman

In beating La Salle Saturday, 81–71, the No. 18 Massachusetts basketball team notched its 19th victory of the season — equaling last year's win total.

They've won 13 of their last 14 games, and have, for the most part, exceeded the expectations of their fans, and the college basketball world, with its near–perfect 11–1 Atlantic– 10 conference record and 19–6 overall mark.

So what was the fuss about following Saturday's game?

"We didn't bury these guys like we wanted to," said Massachusetts guard Charlton Clarke, who led all scorers Saturday with 22 points.

"We had our chances, but gave it right back to them," said Massachusetts coach Bruiser Flint.

Sophomore forward Mike Babul had the perfect explanation.

"It's just tough to get up for a game like today's," he said.

In fact, much has been made of late regarding the Minutemen's inability to put lesser teams away and their tendency to play to the level of their opponents.

True, UMass snuck by a much weaker Duquesne team by six points the same week they buried No. 21 Xavier by 11. You can also make an argument for their two–point loss at Kansas earlier in the season, and a nine–point win at Virginia Tech after blowing a substantial lead in the final minutes.

Corey Peter Goodman

Setting this aside, these guys deserve some credit for just winning basketball games. Only two seasons removed from the Marcus Camby fiasco, and having lost all five starters from its 1996 Final Four team — in addition to the popular coach who turned the program around — UMass has done a remarkable job returning to the national spotlight much earlier than most had expected.

Leading this charge is second–year coach Bruiser Flint. Accepting the head coaching job amidst the Camby turmoil, Flint has produced a talented core of role players without a great deal of help from senior

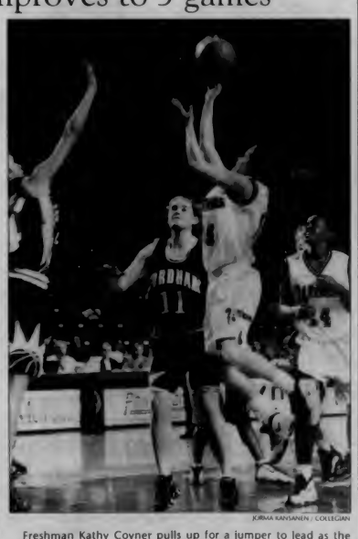
UMass women defeat St. Joseph's; Win streak improves to 5 games



By Kathleen Ralls

For the first time ever in the regular season, the Massachusetts women's basketball team defeated St. Joseph's in Philadelphia. Fifteen times was the charm, as the Minutewomen won the Atlantic–10 conference match up 55–46. This victory was critical to UMass as they improved to 15–9, 9–5 A–10, but still trail St. Joseph's (18–8, 10–4) in the A–10 East by one game.

The first half started much like UMass' previous contests with neither team making a significant run at the other. The even exchange included 6 ties and 11 lead changes. But UMass mounted an 11–5 run to take a 25–19 lead at 4:13. But the Hawks refused to fluster as senior Maureen Costello connected for two layups and Melissa Courtney hit a three pointer to close the gap going into halftime, 25–24. Sophomore Alison MacFarland and junior Tez Kraft once again lead Massachusetts scorers with four apiece in the first half.

The second half proved much of the same flip–flop scoring in the beginning. But St. Joseph's revamped for an 8–0 run as the Minutewomen's shooting cooled off at 36.2 percent from the field. Besides junior Yolanda Rayside's layup at 16:41, and two free throws by senior Kara Tudman, UMass didn't score. But the drought would not last.

Freshman Kathy Coyner nailed a jumper at 7:55 to cut the lead to 39–35. UMass eventually nailed 11–16 free throw attempts in the last 1:32 in the game to secure the victory. MacFarland and Kraft continued on their scoring frenzy as they both finished with 10 points to lead UMass.

Gymnastics posts big win over UNH

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

Not often is it that inclement weather comes into play in the midst of a gymnastics meet. But on Friday, that's exactly what happened as the No. 23 Massachusetts women's gymnastics team squared off against arch–rival No. 22 New Hampshire.

Coach Dave Kuzara had prepared for the forecast. With the temperature in the Curry Hicks Cage hovering around 40 degrees, Kuzara had nine people warm up on the floor exercise, fearing that bodies would tighten up due to the cold.

His plan worked and the Minutewomen were able to squeeze out a 191.325–191.125 victory over the Wildcats.

Senior co–captain Karen Maurer, stepping in for Mandy Mosby on the floor, posted a 9.575, rebounding from a subpar performance on the beam to help the Minutewomen to victory. Freshman sensation Jill Fisher was also unable to perform her dynamic floor routine because she too felt the effects of the frigid gymnasium. Junior Anita Sanyal scored a 38.350 to land her second consecutive all–around victory.

"I think both teams faltered a bit," said Kuzara. "Jill and Mandy couldn't get warm so we needed to rely on our depth."

The Minutewomen jumped out to a two and a half point lead after the first two rotations and looked as strong as ever. They registered a season–high 48.925 on the uneven bars

UM hockey falls to Maine Bears

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

In a weekend sweep looking more like a baseball score than a hockey score, the University of Massachusetts hockey team dropped two games this past weekend to the University of Maine by a combined score of 18–3. However, those were not the only losses for UMass, as senior captain Tim Lovell was indefinitely suspended from the team by the coaching staff, and did not suit up for the two losses.

Maine	8
Massachusetts	1

On the surface, Friday night's 6–1 loss and Saturday night's 12–2 debacle to the Black Bears (12–12–3, 9–10–2 in Hockey East) could have meant the end for the Minutemen momentum–wise for the rest of the season. Believe it or not, UMass (5–20–2, 2–15–1 in Hockey East) is still in the hunt for a conference playoff spot.

The Minutemen can thank No. 10 Boston College, as the Eagles defeated Merrimack College in their home–and–home series this past weekend. Those two losses by the Warriors still keep UMass within three points of the last postseason playoff spot in the conference.

UM track qualifies for ECAC championship

By Paul Teves

The Massachusetts women's track and field squad spent Saturday competing in the St. Valentine's Invitational Track Meet at Boston University. This was considered an Atlantic– 10 Championship tune up for UMass.

"This is a real high quality and competitive meet," said coach Julie LaFreniere. "Teams come from all over the country to compete at BU's real fast track."

UMass took advantage of the ramped track to qualify for both the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference (ECAC) Championships and the New England Championships. A few members of the team recorded personal bests as well.

"Because there were so many good teams competing at this meet, my assistant coaches and I seized the opportunity to evaluate what we have going into the A–10's," said LaFreniere. "We were very pleased with what we saw." UMass was well represented as some had an opportunity to shine and they didn't disappoint.

Shelanda Irish qualified for the ECAC meet with a first place finish in the 55 meter dash (7.18). She also qualified in the 200 meters (25.14) in which she set a new UMass record.

In the 1000 meters, Nicole Way finished first overall in 2:54.20 which was good enough to qualify for the ECAC's. This was only her third time running the race.

Senior Rosey Bryan ran the third fastest UMass time ever in the 200 with a 25.93. She also placed first and subsequently qualified in the 55m hurdles as she tied a UMass record with a time of 8.06. Adding to the winners was senior Anya Forrest who ran the hurdles in 8.28 and finished fifth in a highly competitive field.

Christy Martin returned to competition this weekend for the first time since December. She placed in the top 20 in the mile.

Bank governor fired amid economic crisis

JAKARTA, Indonesia (AP) — President Suharto dismissed the governor of the central bank yesterday amid Indonesia's worst economic crisis in 30 years, while security forces struggled to keep a lid on social unrest prompted by soaring inflation and unemployment. Soedradjad Djiwandono, a key player in negotiations with the International Monetary Fund for a $40 billion rescue package, is believed to have opposed several government decisions on economic policy. He also has angered some Suharto relatives by closing down their insolvent banks.

A presidential decree, dated Feb. 11 but announced yesterday, ended Soedradjad's term as governor of Bank Indonesia. He had served for five years.

For the past eight months, the bank has floundered as the rupiah slid dramatically in value, cutting away years of economic progress for the world's fourth-most populous nation.

The firing came as Suharto faces mounting international criticism over a plan to peg the rupiah to the U.S. dollar through a currency board. Djiwandono is rumored to have had misgivings about the plan.

Companies compete to sell new technology

WASHINGTON (AP) — Companies are in a high-stakes bidding war over the biggest-ever airwaves slices to offer telephone, television and Internet services via new wireless technology.

The Federal Communications Commission will begin auctioning licenses today for the new technology called local multipoint distribution service, or LMDS, and 139 companies are vying for them. The auction is expected to raise hundreds of millions of dollars.

The new wireless service is delivered in a way that closely resembles cellular phone service. But to receive phone, television or data services, customers need a small receiver dish in or near a window.

A total of 986 licenses are on the block. Half of them would give its owner the right to occupy a large swathe of airwaves — 1,150 megahertz — letting a company simultaneously provide 16,000 phone calls and 200 video channels.

The rest of the licenses are for the rights to occupy a smaller, but still considerable, slice of the airwaves — 150 megahertz. One big license and one small license will be auctioned in each of 493 separate markets, every one roughly the size of a metropolitan area.

The FCC hopes companies using the new wireless technology will provide services that compete with local phone and cable companies. The more licenses a company acquires, the more customers it can serve and the more flexibility it has in offering services.

Rape defense class offered to students

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

Female students and staff interested in participating in a Rape Aggression Defense (RAD) class sponsored by the University of Massachusetts Police Department may still have a chance to register.

Students can register at the Police Department in Dickinson Hall from 11 a.m.–1 p.m. today. The 12-hour class, which begins next week, is open to 16 students on a first come, first serve basis.

The class is free and meets four times in three-hour sessions beginning next Monday, Feb. 23, Wednesday Feb. 25, Monday March 2 and Wednesday March 4, from 6 p.m.– 9 p.m. All four classes are mandatory for students to successfully complete the course.

The first three sessions provide students with an overview, discussion and hands-on training of the defense moves. The fourth and final night of the class, is simulation night.

Women in the class review their moves and then face their "aggressor," a police officer who is dressed in protective gear.

The simulation is voluntary and the women can still complete the class if they choose not to participate in simulation night.

UMass Police officers Laura Gordon and Lisa Kidwell run the course and usually play the role of the aggressor.

However, many of the participants prefer Sergeant Robert Thrasher to be the aggressor because, in reality, when women are attacked, the perpetrator is usually male, Gordon said.

RAD is a nation-wide program, offered throughout the country at various colleges and Universities. Anyone who graduates form the course is a lifetime member and can sharpen her skills anywhere in the country for free.

In addition to the RAD class beginning next week, Public Safety is offering a second course beginning Monday, March 23. Registration for that course begins on March 18

Clinton: military our 'only answer'

By Terence Hunt
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Clinton, preparing Americans for possible airstrikes against Iraq, said yesterday that military force is never the first answer "but sometimes it's the only answer." Unless the international community acts, Saddam Hussein will conclude it "has lost its will," Clinton said.

Cautioning that an attack would not be risk free, the president said, "I know that the people we may call upon in uniform are ready. The American people have to be ready as well."

Clinton used a Pentagon setting and a nationally televised speech to define military goals and a rationale for action. He said airstrikes would leave Saddam "significantly worse off than he is now." And if one attack does not achieve U.S. goals, "we will be prepared to strike him again," the president said. Clinton said U.N. inspectors charged with dismantling Saddam's biological, chemical and nuclear weapons have encountered "lies, stonewalling, obstacle after obstacle after obstacle" in the seven years since the Gulf War.

If Saddam is not stopped now, Clinton said, "He will conclude that the international community has lost its will. He will then conclude that he can go right on and do more to rebuild an arsenal of devastating destruction."

"And some day, some way, I guarantee you, he'll use the arsenal," the president said. He said Saddam "could end this crisis tomorrow simply by letting the weapons inspectors complete their mission."

Defense Secretary William Cohen said, "Iraq must understand that our patience is not infinite. And at some

Concerns raised over UC 2000

Many students feel left out of plans to renovate Student Union

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts student-run businesses and Registered Student Organizations (RSOs) are largely unaware of University Center 2000 (UC 2000), the plan to renovate the Student Union, which would move student-run business and RSO spaces.

Despite several workshops last semester to involve student- run businesses and RSOs in the planning, many of the groups were still uncertain of what the plan entailed.

"I didn't even know this was going on. It's our Student Union. We should have some say," said Chani Bergen, Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MassPIRG) intern.

"I'm kind of familiar with it. I'm really not involved with it. I just hope it goes well," said Mike Ellis, co-manager of Campus Center Design and Copy.

"My only objection to what I've heard is that I haven't heard enough about it," said Mark Lantiqua, board member of the UMass Ski and Board club.

"I've heard a little bit about it," said Emma Gilbert, co- manager of the People's Market.

"We have talked to over 50 RSOs... surveyed 500 students over the phone and held dozens of workshops," Mark Kenan, director of SCERA, said in an interview earlier this month. "We have widely publicized these workshops. We have tried very hard to involve as many students as we can in the process."

Although some student-run businesses are aware of the plan, there are differences in opinion regarding it.

"I heard they're trying to phase out student businesses. I thought it was a horrible idea. A lot of students love our services," said Nikki Bilwakesh, co-manager of the People's Market.

Elizabeth Dale, Judy Steinkamp and Beverly Wood of the Office of Space Management could not be reached for comment about student concerns.

"Some people [believe the UC 2000 planning is] trying to shove out student business, but it's not," said Shana Connor employee of Earthfoods.

"We've been to some [planning] meetings. They're just getting information on what we want. They want to help us. They're doing what they can. It [UC 2000] sounds good. They're looking out for us," Connor said.

A coalition has been formed by the Game Hobbyist League and the Science Fiction Society in order to independently evaluate the needs of groups such as RSOs and student-run businesses. The coalition would like to present the findings of these evaluations at the same time as the UC 2000 presentation.

Two Bosnian Serbs plead innocent to charges of war crime

By Mike Corder
Associated Press

THE HAGUE, Netherlands — The only Bosnian Serbs to surrender to the Yugoslav war crimes tribunal pleaded innocent yesterday — and thanked U.S. diplomats and NATO troops for helping them get to the U.N. court.

Milan Simic and Miroslav Tadic gave themselves up in Bosnia on Saturday to face charges they took part in a 1992 Serb terror campaign aimed at driving Bosnian Croats and Muslims out of the town of Bosanski Samac in northern Bosnia.

Surprisingly, the two expressed appreciation at their arraignments yesterday for the efforts of those who helped bring them before the tribunal — where, if convicted, they face possible life sentences.

"I can only express my gratitude to those who made it possible for us to voluntarily come here without any coercion, especially the staff of the American Embassy," Tadic said after pleading innocent to one count each of war crimes and crimes against humanity.

"After I am released, I will seek asylum here because I like it here very much," he added.

Simic, who was paralyzed in a mine explosion in 1993 and still uses a wheelchair, pleaded innocent to three charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity.

"I also would like to express my pleasant surprise at the very correct behavior" of the NATO peacekeepers, he said. "Everybody is going out of their way to help me."

The surrenders could mark a turning point — or simply a fluke — in the tribunal's efforts to bring those accused of wartime atrocities to justice. In the past, Serbs have branded the court anti-Serbian and refused to stand trial here; one Bosnian Serb was killed in a clash with Western forces trying to capture him for trial.

Internships available for summer in Disney World

By Jason Eiseman
Collegian Staff

Mickey Mouse wants you.

Disney recruiters are looking for students to participate in their Walt Disney World College Program, and work for the summer or the fall semester at the Magic Kingdom in Orlando. There will be an information session at 7 p.m. tonight in Mahar Auditorium.

Jeff Chaban, a senior human resources management major, is the University of Massachusetts campus representative for the program. He was part of the program in the summer of 1996, working in Food & Beverage in the Magic Kingdom.

"It changed my life. I'm not a big Disney buff, but I'm a big advocate of the program," Chaban said. He said it is a paid internship, and through certain departments students can earn credits.

Chaban said the information session will last about two hours, and recruiters will outline the three segments of the program. The first segment involves living issues, such as rent and roommates.

The second segment is the learning segment. Students in the program will be attending Disney University, where they learn about Disney, in addition to working. The third segment is the working segment.

Some of the benefits Chaban outlined included free admission to all of the parks in the Magic Kingdom and discounts at resorts.

Doug Henkin, a senior hotel restaurant and travel administration major, said that being able to travel was a benefit as well. He said when he had two days off in a row he would travel to places like Tampa, Daytona, Cocoa Beach, and Boca Raton.

"I worked at the Latta Watta at Blizzard Beach, the world's most visited water park," Henkin said.

Henkin said his most rewarding experiences came dealing with people. He said when he saw a child crying he would give them a stamp of Mickey Mouse on their hand and an ice cream cone.

Henkin said the work was difficult. "You had to do everything perfect, as you were told," Henkin said. He said it is all worth it to put the experience on a resume.

"It was the life," Henkin said about the living conditions, which he called "nice condos." He said he had access to pools, Jacuzzis, as well as tennis and basketball courts.

Henkin said students from all over the country and the world work in the program, including cultural representatives from all of the countries represented in Epcot Center.

Tonight, students will have the opportunity, at the end of the information session, to sign up for interviews which will be held on Friday, and about three weeks later students will find out if they were hired.

Chaban said students will be working at all four parks in Disney World, MGM Studios, Epcot Center, the Magic Kingdom, and Animal Kingdom, a new park which will be open in the summer.

Disney representatives will also be recruiting students to work during the fall semester. Chaban said students have a much better chance of being chosen for the fall semester, because the summer internships are so competitive.

Every year, Disney takes anywhere from 15 to 75 UMass students, Chaban said. He said UMass is one of the flagship school for the college program.

Back to the tables

The University of Massachusetts administration has done the entire Amherst campus community a grave disservice in its declaration of an impasse with the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) in its contract talks. The administration should return its negotiators to the table before GEO's deadline of 5 p.m. today.

Susan Pearson, the chief negotiator for the administration, has stated that GEO is not protected by laws that say only an outside mediator can declare an impasse. If this is true, it still does not change the fact that GEO is a union representing members of the student body, and should be bargained with in good faith.

If what Ms. Pearson says is not true, and the impasse declaration is, as GEO insists, illegal, the situation remains much the same. The administration is clearly attempting to circumvent its obligation to come to an agreement with GEO through a process of compromise.

"The administration is clearly attempting to circumvent its obligation to come to an agreement with GEO through a process of compromise."

It is important to remember that this situation has a profound impact on undergraduate students. Approximately 50 percent of our courses are taught by graduate students represented by GEO. When the administration refuses to show respect and fairness to these students, its actions impact the quality of the teaching we receive.

The administration has the money to settle the GEO contract in an honorable manner, and it should do so immediately. Chancellor Scott would be well advised to do what will be best for the quality of the education available at UMass.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of the Collegian Editorial Board.

David Scott: Unionbuster

Drunk with power, Chancellor David "Unionbuster" Scott has canceled administration negotiations with the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) and announced that he will unilaterally impose his own version of the new GEO contract.

This illegal act is an outrageous abuse of power and an overt effort at unionbusting. It is part and parcel of the whole drift towards privatization and downsizing at UMass, which reduces staff and faculty, turns student IDs into credit cards, creates elite "honors" enclaves, brings fast food chains into the Campus Center and seeks to abolish tenure.

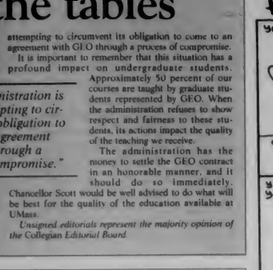
Now, in a marvelous example of "vertical integration," Scott has become his own unionbusting goon.

Unionbuster's illegal action is a direct response to the unanimous rejection of his latest contract offer (which he will now enforce anyway) by a meeting of over 100 GEO members on Feb. 11.

Facing a strong, united and determined union demanding reasonable progressive reforms, Scott immediately declared a state of "impasse," canceling negotiations and imposing his proposals.

Under Massachusetts labor law, "impasse" can only be declared by a mediator as part of an established process. But Scott, who has the mentality of a village tyrant, believes that his word is the law. He has usurped power and authority which are not his under the law, but which, like any good caudillo, he simply takes.

Scott is seeking to block GEO's proposals for increased funding for educational access, all the while prancing around campus calling for diversity and access. He knows that levels of African-American and Latino representation in the graduate school have been collapsing over recent years. But Unionbuster prefers to create a crisis by declaring impasse rather than coming to terms with GEO's constructive proposals to address this serious problem.



GEO's strong stance on affirmative action, child care and other issues of educational access have been particularly galling to Unionbuster and his henchmen. For years they have sought to speak publicly on behalf of multiculturalism, diversity and access, while at the same time pursuing a corporate agenda that is completely opposed to these values.

The Goodell protest, which saw Fearless Leader scurrying off to Mexico for the duration, did much to expose the rank hypocrisy behind Scott's supposed "commitment to multiculturalism."

Scott's utter indifference to the crisis in diversity at the graduate level and bitter opposition to GEO's attempts to salvage the situation only further reinforce the growing awareness that no matter what his rhetoric may be and however many "multicultural awards" he hands out, the Chancellor is a committed enemy of diversity.

GEO's unwillingness to back down from its commitment to diversity and access at UMass has infuriated and exposed the Chancellor. Unionbuster vengefully plans to cripple GEO by reducing the number of its organizers from eight — which he knows was already a bare-bones staff for a union representing 2,600 employees — to a mere two. He hopes that this will eliminate GEO as an effective organization and reduce it to a mere symbolic presence at any future contract talks.

In order to split the union membership, David "200 K"

Scott's cynical plan calls for wage increases for some graduate employees, but leaves at least 1,000 with no increase to their below-poverty-level paychecks.

All of this Scott describes as "extremely generous."

In illegally declaring "impasse," Unionbuster's attitude is, as Thucydides put it, that "the strong do what they can, the weak suffer what they must."

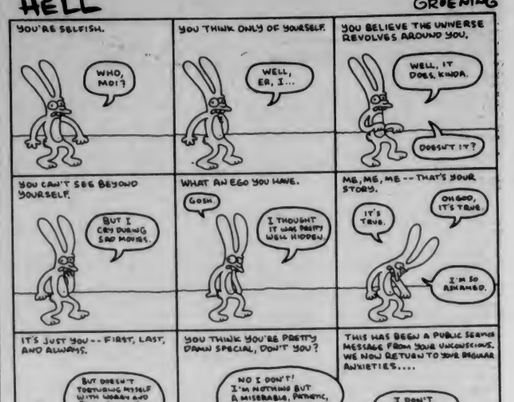
He abuses his power in this manner because he is unable to deal with a united, progressive graduate union in a lawful manner, and, like other unscrupulous management, believes that he can get away with it.

Meanwhile his press releases are filled with outright lies, distortions and misrepresentations of GEO positions. This is, of course, because the truth clearly exposes the Chancellor as a union-busting, anti-multicultural, petty despot.

No one is fooled anymore. Whatever action GEO takes, it can clearly rely on a united graduate student body, wholehearted support from all other campus unions and widespread support from faculty, staff and undergraduates.

The Chancellor has clearly gone too far this time. Like others who abused power by usurping authority (Nixon instantly springs to mind), he has over-reached at last.

Chancellor Scott must and will be made to obey the law.



The only viable option left to Unionbuster is to return to the negotiating table.

Impasse illegal

To the editor:

I am not speaking as the Chief Negotiator for the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) who has been bargaining their contract for two years, but I am speaking from that experience. Given the outrageous actions by Chancellor Scott and his Chief Negotiator Sue Pearson, I feel the need to respond publicly to their efforts.

This attack [the recent declaration of an impasse by the administration] is nothing less that a badly designed, premeditated union busting move. One that, if successful (which it won't be), would become the model for all unions on campus.

First, the impasse that Chancellor Scott declared is illegal. Management does not have the right to declare impasse unilaterally. They first have to apply to the state mediation board for a mediator. The mediator then tries to bring both sides together. If that fails, then there is a fact finding period, where both sides present evidence to support their point of view. Then that is followed by more mediation. If that fails, then it is the mediator who declares impasse, not the management. If managements had the right to stop negotiating and impose their will in contract negotiations, they would do it all the time.

For those of you who don't know what an impasse is, it is when bargaining reaches a point where no more movement is possible, either side, and the efforts of the mediator can not settle the contract. If impasse is declared, then management's last offer is implemented. Management can not call for an impasse when the opposing side has made significant movement (as GEO did that day), nor when there are outstanding information requests relevant to mandatory subjects of bargaining (like wages, health care, workload, union security).

GEO moved in its last counter-proposal on almost every area still on the table. On wages, GEO reduced its demand from $11,000 to $10,500, leaving it 435 dollars apart from the administration's position. GEO dropped its proposal on Preparation Time, Workload, and Workplace Conditions.

Our wage proposal and our health care proposal would come from state money. Only our Educational Access proposal and the Child Care proposal (for grads, undergrads and workers) would come out of UMass money.

The administration's Balance Statement this past June shows that UMass has at least a $17.2 million cash surplus in unrestricted money! The total cost of our package to the university budget next year (its peak) would be $1.36 million. The difference between our positions on all subjects that affect the UMass budget is only $400,000.

If administrators were so interested in raising the wages of graduate employees, then why did they take a year and a half to even respond to GEO's wage demand? Who is stalling? While GEO has dropped its proposal dramatically in order to seek settlement, the administration has shown no real movement in this area.

Every time the administration opens its mouth or sends out more paper, it only builds the case for bad faith bargaining. It is clearly a union busting tactic that will leave all other unions on this campus vulnerable to similar attacks.

If GEO is successfully busted, then all those things that GEO secured for its membership (wages, tuition waivers, health care, etc.) will be at risk in the future.

Only a strong union can protect its members. This attack comes on the heels of the administration's walking away from the Goodell negotiations. Thus, this is an attack on students as well as workers. It's time that the administration get back to the table and settle this contract. Lies and attacks on GEO will only get them into further trouble with the law.

Administration in the wrong

To the editor:

Employers are required to file for mediation at the State Board of Mediation and Conciliation if they believe that they are at an impasse. The State assigns a mediator, who — if agreement cannot be reached — will send the case to fact finding.

The Fact Finder will make a report, after which the parties meet again with the mediator. If the parties are then unable to reach agreement after a reasonable period of time, the Chair of the Mediation and Conciliation Board can declare an impasse, and the employer may then unilaterally implement his last offer.

For some reason, Chancellor Scott decided that he could skip all of these stages of mediation and jump right to implementation. In doing so, he has flaunted established labor law and the protections that do exist for workers' rights. His explanation? That GEO is not "really" a union.

After recognizing GEO as a union in 1991, after negotiating two contracts, after two years of bargaining for a third contract, after the issue of GEO's certification has been settled at the table, GEO is suddenly "no longer" a union, Chief Negotiator and Associate Chancellor Sue Pearson has explained.

Since the administration refuses to see GEO at the table, it looks as though the administration will be seeing GEO in court.

Ending negotiations sign of bad faith

To the editor:

As a graduate student and a graduate employee at UMass, I can barely express the sense of outrage and betrayal I feel at the administration's decision to declare an impasse at the negotiations with GEO.

The administration has every right to articulate its demands, even if they are different from those of the graduate employees. However, to terminate negotiations unilaterally is a sign of extreme bad faith and demonstrates a lack of concern for a group of people that have steadily labored to keep this university functioning.

The administration may have resorted to this illegal action, but they can be sure that we as students and public employees will not terminate our struggle to secure the minimum justice for affirmative action, child care and the right to organize ourselves as a union.

A budding career cut short

Dear Casey,

I'm not the sappiest of guys, but man, you have cracked open my tree.

Your struggle against the fascist forces of the PGA has raised my consciousness about the inane nature of many practices we consider a part of "the system." I mean, It's golf, not basketball, you're trying to make bend the rules. And it's a fair bend at that, considering when you take it to the hole, no vertical is required.

Neither of us can run away from our challenges. (Well, at least you can't, but that's not important.) That's why we must continue to fight the good fight, even in our darkest hours. Goshdarnit, you should have the privilege to ride in that cart — it's not like you're a paraplegic distance runner losing it into fourth gear to show up some Moroccans. Yours is a legitimate disability in a sport that can afford to offer you a little leeway.

But let's talk a little more about this NBA thing, Case. Now, I've been playing b-ball off and on during the summer since I was 16 or 17. I'm 22 now — that's dedication. My jumper is as nearly reliable as Dennis Rodman's. I got hops like Larry Bird. Baggsy and I have almost identical post-up moves. And my crossover is as nice as Tim Hardaway's — when he was under anesthesia on the operating table for his ACL blowout. I was ready out of high school.

I think I deserve a shot, don't you Casey-Face? But since the system is determined to keep me down, legal action was necessary to get my voice heard on the national level. The following is a transcript of my first — and likely only — conversation with NBA Commissioner David Stern:

CTC: Hey, Dave. Can I call you Dave?

DS: No.

CTC: Such a kidder. Anyway, Dave, this is C. Conner from the U of the Mass. I represent myself and I need a tryout. The Clips, the Grizz, Toronto, I don't care. I'm flexible, D.

DS: Who are you? Kirkland? Good enthusiasm, stay in school 'bout two more. You'll be set. Talk to ya then.

CTC: It's Conner, not Kirkland. And maybe you wouldn't so quick to blow me off if you knew I'd hired Johnnie Cochran's (mumbled) cousin's brother's babysitter's (mumbled lower)'s aunt's hairdresser's (mumbled even lower) godmother's gynecologist's lover's lawyer's lawyer.

DS: What you wanna do? Wanna be a baller? Shot-caller? Brawler? Wise up, poopy-poo. The league is tracing this call, and our "handyman" Latrell is on the way to your house.

CTC: I will not be intimidated, Stern. You can bite my...

(Sound of door being kicked down. Sound of blows being landed on a 5-foot-8 body. Sound of silence. Sound of more blows 10-15 minutes later. Sound of silence.)

Can you believe that, Case-Dog? Luckily, my medical bills were generously taken care of by a mystery philanthropist with the initials "P.J." After healing from the punching spree, I almost considered packing it in as a freedom fighter, but if this P.J. character had faith in the cause, I knew its time had not yet come to a close.

But where to start anew? If the NBA wouldn't permit me to join its ranks due to my woeful lack of talent, I figured out pretty quickly that other professional sports organizations might employ the same nasty tactics to keep me out. If I stepped on too many toes, I might even be found dead one day in a gutter, drowned in the collective spit of Eric Lindros, Robbie Alomar and Bill Romanowski.

Broadening my horizons was where it was at, Case in Point. I turned on the boob tube for some creative downtime. The vision came to me in the form of a sea of pulsating ebony bodies — I would become a "Soul Train" dancer. There would definitely be a place for me in this legendary venue, I thought.

El systemo proved me wrong again.

The audition was without question a nightmare, Casey Kane. I pulled out all the stops, using slick as silk moves from all the masters — Smokey Robinson, Lionel Richie, Marvin Gaye, etc. — in my electrifying routine. While I still stand firm in the belief that my performance was a rousing success, the unabashed cruelty — the worst being the pooch slap from Don Cornelius — to which I was subjected was close to overwhelming.

"Oh, yeah, it's sooo hard to move with basic rhythm and look like you have a clue," I raged at the "pundits" of dance. "But let's see you try to stay this rigid and uncoordinated. Then we'll see who's the new Alvin Ailey and who's just like the rest of the looney-goosey-limbed masses."

Yes, Casey, I too have been trampled under the dog-dirt smeared boot of discrimination. Damn, it's stinky. And while you may actually have the ability to play golf on a pro level, that doesn't change the hurt for either of us.

So let's make a pact right here and now. If you'll be my bodyguard, I can be your long lost pal. I can call you Casey, and Casey when you call me, you can call me...

Anthrax has home at UMass

I was at the edge of the Mekong Jungle when I saw it, a species of tall grass that populates the countryside across Southern Vietnam. It grows so thick and prosperous that it prevents all other vegetation from being cultivated, making once fertile land completely barren.

The locals call it "American Grass," and it is just one of the many reminders to the Vietnamese of a war-torn past at the hands of American colonialists.

American Grass is a direct result of Agent Orange and the 15 other herbicides used in defoliation attacks, which sprayed an area roughly the size of Massachusetts, destroying the jungles of Vietnam. Even today, thousands of Vietnamese still die from effects of American chemical warfare.

Amnon Kapeliouk, an Israeli journalist, reported after a 1988 visit to Vietnam "terrifying" scenes in hospitals of children dying of cancer and birth deformities as a result of Agent Orange. Kapeliouk wrote of listening to the tales of orphaned children and widows from the war.

"Hair-raising stories that remind me of what we heard during the trials of Eichmann and Demjanjuk."

According to Harry Weisberg in his 1970 book, Ecocide in Indochina, the pesticides used in Vietnam found their way into streams and rivers which eventually poisoned all animal and plant life. This resulted in not only deaths and malformed babies, but also grave social problems.

Governments unjustly using chemical warfare on innocent civilians is nothing new it seems — especially when it's the United States.

Today, our designated enemy, Saddam Hussein, is said to have the power to create weapons of mass destruction capable of killing every person on the planet. And we're going to stop him by bombing the hell out of his country.

One of the weapons Saddam is said to hold is the "poor man's nukes," the deadly Anthrax. Our own University's campus has an intimate history with Anthrax which many may not be aware of.

Nine years ago it was revealed that UMass was conducting Anthrax research for the Department of Defense as part of the Army's Biological Defense Research Program.

From 1981-1992 UMass Professor Curtis B. Thorne researched, on a $1 million military grant, a possible vaccination for this deadly disease.

At the time there was great uproar from students upset with the University's contribution to the military-industrial complex. People feared that not only was it environmentally dangerous, but that the research could only be used for harm towards poorer, less defended Third World countries.

The University claimed that it was harmless, and as far as supporting the Department of Defense, money was money, and professors were allowed to research what they wanted.

The students responded by taking over buildings, and going on hunger strikes. By May 1989, 150 students were arrested.

Thorne claimed that the research he was doing was purely defensive, aimed at finding a vaccine to the disease.

Jonathan King, a molecular biologist at MIT disagrees. He believes that there is no difference between offensive and defensive research because the same components are used regardless of the intent.

According to the UMass press office, all Anthrax research ended when Thorne retired in 1992. That's the "official" word anyway.

Thorne did retire in 1992, but it was found that he was continuing his research along with his military funding. According to University records revealed in the Daily Hampshire Gazette in 1994, a contract was found signed by Thorne with the Department of Defense, to continue research to the end of 1994.

Last December, Defense Secretary William Cohen stated that all of America's men and women in uniform should be inoculated against Anthrax. Inoculation aimed at preserving American lives not Iraqi ones; privileged First World lives, not disadvantaged Third World ones.

And we are a University, had a hand in it. UMass participated in research that would ensure that American colonialism would prevail and innocent civilians would die. UMass helped to aid a military that bombs innocent civilians, starves the survivors and then plans to bomb it again. Our hands are covered with blood which no amount of laboratory disinfectant can rid.

No one seems to see the 567,000 children who have been murdered due to the United Nations [read United States] sanctions against Iraq, or the one million Iraqi children who are suffering from chronic malnutrition today. And God forbid that as human beings, Iraqis would want to defend themselves.

In the coming Iraqi conflict, no one seems to recall the chemical warfare conducted by the United States in countries such as Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia. If anyone is harboring weapons of mass destruction, it's us. But if I can't appeal to your moral sensibilities, allow me to appeal to your sense of fear.

According to Jeremy Rifkin, president of the Foundation on Economic Trends, Anthrax disease spores have a long life. Some contaminated Anthrax labs have remained infested for 15 years. If Anthrax research did end in 1994, that means we've got 11 years left to worry. I suggest you think twice before you walk into Morrill Science Center. Perhaps the power to kill every person on the planet will come from a dormant Anthrax spore in Amherst and not Baghdad.

Surviving Mr. Interviewer

The man sitting opposite me smiled and said, "So, why should we hire you?"

And suddenly the walls started to close in and my fingers started fiddling anxiously with my ring.

I could tell the truth, which was, "W...I don't exactly know." Or I could lie out of the side of my mouth and tell him that I would be a wonderful asset to his company and that in a matter of minutes, my inclusion into his firm would increase the company's gross margin.

There's something hellish about the interviewing process, that whole idea of prostituting yourself to the point of exhaustion. All the time your mind is running at warp speed, trying to digest the questions hurled at you as well as the appropriate answers. You not only have to sound intelligent, but sincere and sycophantic as well.

There are a variety of different questions posed during an interview. For example, there is the "Tell me about yourself" type.

It sounds easy, but this type of question really sucks. It's broad. Really broad. You have to give the Interviewer the information he wants to know about without knowing what he wants to know. For instance, he might want to know that you can learn a programming language in 30 seconds or that you can touch your nose with your tongue.

These questions also make it easier to make a fool out of yourself. See, the interviewer just has to sit back and listen to you babble on and on. And if you're like me and don't know where to stop, pretty soon you're telling this person about your tire changing ability than anything else.

If anything, interviewing is a painfully miserable process, right from your head to the tips of your shiny shoes. You have 45 minutes to impress an interviewer, and the right or wrong answer can determine whether you get called back for a second interview.

But if you play your cards right, maybe one day you will be the one sitting on the opposite side of the desk saying, "So tell me about yourself."

Tasks of Jewish journalism

One of the goals of a newspaper is to be a medium between people and the institutions which govern them; this is done by providing information which allows people to formulate their own ideas about how those institutions can better serve society.

This is never a simple relationship, but with the minority press (either ethnic or ideological), the gap between people and those who represent them is even more difficult to bridge. While there may be a complex system of interlocking organizations, there is no official governing body which creates laws.

The Jewish-American press is no different, for it must confront a dilemma in which the average member of a Jewish community probably has no idea who represents their Jewish voice on the national stage, even though the President and Congress are totally aware of who the players are.

So an essential task of America's Jewish press is identifying to its readers the people and the organizations which represent the separate communities and the Jewish-American population as a whole. The closest thing to a congressional body is the General Assembly for the Council of Jewish Federation (CJF.) These various federations act as advocates for Jewish communities, and like a legislature, are based upon geographic areas.

One could argue that the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) is the true representation of the American-Jewish voice. The UJA is integral in funding programs with Israel and sending Jews, including Americans, to the Jewish state. Yet the UJA is a sister organization to the World Zionist Organization (WZO), which may be rendered obsolete if the worldwide conferences on Jewish policy cease. Understanding the difference between these two organizations can be challenging for the most enthusiastic activist.

When discussing foreign policy, the Middle East and the State of Israel, the American Israeli Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) must be mentioned. It is unquestionably the strongest and most well-organized lobbyist organization with respect to a specific country. Although different Arab lobby groups have gained strength in this country, AIPAC has been praised by South Korea, who wants the same kind of assistance from the Korean diaspora. It has also been criticized, especially by those who oppose Israel or Israel's control over occupied territories, as having disproportionate influence over Congress.

Gaining a basic vocabulary of the political representation of the Jewish voice takes a step beyond the misconceptions of Jewish power and influence. In covering these institutions the press of the Jewish voice, is a misguided and potentially bigoted argument. It suggests planning and conspiracy which simply does not exist. In a reversed instance one could say "The" Americans may bomb Iraq, but could we say that about Americans since most Americans will never see Iraq?

Identity is complicated. It needs a public voice but should not be confused with that public voice. Here on campus there are several organizations which act on behalf of the Jewish population. Namely, the Jewish Student Union (formerly the Hillel council) and the administrative Office of Jewish Affairs. So, while every student on this campus could serve to have some knowledge of SGA, Jewish students should have some awareness of those offices which act on their behalf. This means the student press bears responsibility as well.

proceed expeditiously toward settlement, this has not been the case. Indeed, the recent declaration of bargaining impasse seems to foreclose the possibility of a mutually acceptable resolution between the parties.

As faculty of this campus and as members of a larger academic community, we are concerned that the negotiation process with GEO has come to an abrupt and undemocratic end. Although we do not necessarily wish to concern ourselves with the specifics of the implemented contract, we do feel that the administration has an obligation to participate in the legally mandated process of mediation before declaring an impasse. We feel that this action on the part of the administration might have regrettable consequences on the labor-management relations on this campus.

We see the present declaration of impasse as unfortunate and as something that should be resolved urgently. We feel that it is not only important to settle the GEO contract negotiations in a democratic fashion but that it is essential to maintain an atmosphere of mutual trust and reciprocity among various members of the University community. We urge the administration to revoke the impasse and return to the bargaining table.

Unions should write in support of GEO

To the editor:

Writing as bot h a graduate student and a graduate teaching assistant, I feel compelled to address the outrageous declaration of bargaining impasse by the University administration. The contract negotiations between the Graduate Employee Organization, UAW Local 2322 (GEO) and the administration have been an ongoing folly for almost two years. The administration's constant stalling and incalcitrant bargaining stance has made a mockery of the collective bargaining process as outlined by the National Labor Relations Act of 1936 and the Taft-Hartley Amendments of 1947.

However, their recent declaration of impasse marks a new low in the negotiating process. Not only has the administration consistently refused to bargain in good faith (that is, to bergain with the actual intention of coming to a mutually acceptable contract agreement), but it has become painfully clear that this rather suspect declaration of impasse was made with the outright intention of breaking the union.

Because the contract that the administration wishes to implement will actually provide raises (and paltry raises at that) to only approximately 1,600 of GEO's 2,600 members, Chancellor Scott and his cronies are obviously hoping to divide the membership, expecting this pathetic pay raise will, in effect, buy the silence of the majority. If this is not proof enough, the fact that the implemented contract also includes a provision to cut GEO's office staff from eight TA's to two should clarify the situation. Scott is attempting to break GEO.

It must be understood, however, that these strong-armed, union-busting tactics do not simply jeopardize the future of GEO. If Scott and his lackeys can get away with this affront to unionism and the collective bargaining process in general, don't think that he will stop there. If this administration successfully implements their contract in the tyrannical fashion it has chosen to pursue, all other unions on this campus had best beware.

Now is the time to unite in union solidarity! The only power working people have is the utilization or retention of their labor. United as one, we can defeat this strong-armed union buster we know as Chancellor Scott.

The former "Saturday Night Live" star has grown up, and while he may not have DiCaprio's golden locks or Cruise's white-toothed smile, he sure has charm.

His new film, The Wedding Singer, is filled with the kind of candy-coated, good natured niceness that made the 80s the decade we all so fondly remember. But lest it lapse into an exercise in making us happy, the movie contains trademark Sandler sarcasm, outbursts of temper and — most effectively — musical escapades.

The year is 1985, and Sandler plays Robbie Hart, a guy with a dream of being a rock-star, and a fiance who dreams of dating a rock star. When both goals fall through, Robbie finds himself a wedding singer, and horribly left at the altar on the big day. It's this sort of underdog, lost-love simplicity that propels The Wedding Singer into a blissful state of comedy, when you know exactly what's going to happen but smile and laugh hysterically anyway.

Robbie is a great wedding singer, until the fiancé breaks his heart and he breaks down. Much to the shock of the wedding guests, he barely spits out a sobby rendition of Madonna's "Holiday" and in one of

Cornershop, NIN true originals

CLOSURE
Nine Inch Nails
Interscope Home Video

Say what you will about America's most miserable, angst-ridden musician, but to deny Trent Reznor his due credit as one of America's most innovative and challenging recording artists in the last decade would be a grievous error.

Not content to put out the traditional, stale live video to document the groundbreaking "Self Destruct '94-'95" tour, Reznor has come up with an often perverse, sometimes serious, but always entertaining two-video set Closure.

The first video presents a look into the world of dressing rooms and on-the-road meetings interspersed with live footage shot with a hand-held camera which reveal Reznor to be nearly as obsessed over stage lighting details as he is about the music itself. In stark contrast to the boorish onstage behavior he exhibits in concert where the push-pull tension between performer and audience is palpable, Reznor is mostly a quiet introvert off stage.

The real reason to buy Closure, however, is the second video. Presenting each of NIN's music videos in chronological order, it collects several "lost" and "banned" clips. Indeed, the famous snuff video for "Happiness In Slavery" is here in all its masochistic glory. While it's quite disturbing and certainly not for the squeamish, it does showcase the music video as an art form — a fundamental trait lacking in most of today's boring videos. "Closer" (here in un-edited form) is another gem, based on the photography of '20s icon Joel-Peter Witkin. A- (Marty Keane)

WHEN I WAS BORN FOR THE 7TH TIME
Cornershop
Luaka Bop / Warner Bros.

A lot of people have made a really big deal about lead singer and songwriter Tjinder Singh's Anglo-Indian heritage. In fact almost every review mentions it. I'm getting it out of the way in the first sentence so that we can concentrate on what really counts: the music.

"Sleep On The Left Side" opens up When I Was Born For the 7th Time with a lazy hip-hop beat that you might expect to find on a De La Soul album rather then that of an indie-pop band. This, in essence, is what makes Cornershop such a great band — their ability to float between genres smoothly. "Brimful of Asha," the second track, is the current hit single with the soon-to-be-famous line "Everybody needs bosom for a pillow."

After the first two songs, the album blossoms into a beautiful soundscape incorporating elements of hip-hop beats, Indian music samples, scratching and the band's unique take on indie-pop. The aural wall of sound is comprised of flutes, samplers, guitars, chimes and just about every other instrument you don't expect to find on an album, at least not one this accessible. To help exemplify the diversity of this band, "Good To Be On The Road Back Home" is a duet with Paula Frazer, which is yet another reason to buy this album.

You could buy this album because of its indie-pop credibility, or because of the catchy hit single or because you support this band's anti-racism message. But the bottom line is that you should own this album for its ability to combine so many diverse sounds into one cohesive masterpiece. In a land where everything sounds recycled, I applaud Cornershop for offering some diversity and life into a scene that desperately needs both. A (Adam Dlugacz)

ANALAPHABETAPOLOTHOLOGY
Cap'n Jazz
Jade Tree

Cap'n Jazz are cooler than Fonzie's jacket. Perhaps one of the most influential bands ever to release only one album, the band not only influenced many contemporary emo bands, but also gave birth to two other great bands: The Promise Ring and Joan of Arc. Until now, it was hard to get a copy of this overlooked piece of art, but Jade Tree has been kind enough to put together two discs that give us an overview of their brief career.

It is written in the liner notes that re-issues "undermine our pretenses by making what was once special and precious in its rarity now somehow a little less in its convenient availability." Whoever it is may be using a bit too much hyperbole, being that the original Cap'n Jazz disc was as easy to find as the Holy Grail, and I'm no Indiana Jones. The problem is, we are given too much of a good thing.

The first disc gives us the original album in its entirety, plus a couple of extras tracks, including a cover of A-ha's "Take On Me." It's an impressive collection, even without the extras. The band was nothing if not inventive, and the originality comes through in tracks like "Little League" and "Oh Messy Life."

The second disc is less cohesive, which makes sense since it is patched together from singles and demos. It's hard to listen to the second disc, being that you have such a perfect first disc right in front of you. The second disc does contain their cover of the 90210 theme song which makes for some interesting listening.

After all, there's only so much emo you can take. Disc 1— A. Disc 2— B- (Mike Messaros)

Talking To Animals
Velvel

Phil Collins had a quote once: "So take me home...'cause I don't remember." What does this have to do with the Talking To Animals album Manhole? Nothing. But what does Talking To Animals have to do with exciting original music? Nothing again.

OK, so maybe I'm being a bit harsh. And maybe I'm just shamelessly trying to work Phil Collins quotes into record reviews, but that's neither here nor there. The fact is that Manhole is an album that does nothing for me. It doesn't make me get up and say "This sucks!" and it doesn't make me nod my head and say "Don't stop the rock..." It just kind of plays on and on through 11 tracks of uninspired nightclubby, grindy music.

Each song reminds me of someone else's song, but not in a good way. One song seems to have lifted its melody right from Sarah McLachlan's "Building A Mystery" and another tries to sound like P.J. Harvey. Don't try that anymore, guys.

On the whole the album reminds me of the mall. That's not a good thing. If you really want to get this album, even after this review, wait a few weeks and look in one of the local used record stores. I'll leave you a copy. C (M.M.)

the movie's superb scenes, pays musical tribute to his ex-fiancé. "I wrote half of it before the wedding," Robbie warns his new friend, Julia (Drew Barrymore), "and the other half after."

Such a warning is definitely needed, because our anticipation of what is to come could never match what actually does. Sandler revels in changing on a dime from sincere to homicidal, and his efforts here are so much better than those in Billy Madison and Happy Gilmore.

Part of the reason is that Sandler always stays in character, but he also has a lot of help. Working as an 80s tribute, the film mixes a classic soundtrack (Billy Idol's "White Wedding" and a Robbie-enhanced "Love Stinks"), picture-perfect pastels, and a myriad of pop culture references (like the Back to the Future DeLorean that Julia's fiancé drives).

Robbie's friends dress like Michael Jackson, Madonna and Boy George, and are stuck in the culture-induced façade they have created for themselves. In the 80s (and perhaps today, too), image was everything, but The Wedding Singer cleverly points out that everyone just wants somebody to care for.

Turning up in great cameos are Steve Buscemi as a loser alcoholic, fellow "Saturday Night Live" alumni Kevin Nealon and Jon Lovitz, a pathetic competing wedding singer.

The rest of the Wedding Singer's skit-like, meager plot has Robbie finding love with Julia, even though both characters don't want to admit it. Here's where the film loses its fun appeal: the romance becomes the focus and the script shows some lingering blandness. Soundtracks can't save everything, but Billy Idol can; yes, even he shows up in the film's finale, a beautifully sweet and comedic ending that officially makes The Wedding Singer a critically valid romantic comedy.

Angelic, dewy-eyed, and cute-as-a-button, who better to play the flower-child of the 80s than Drew Barrymore? Back in 1985, Barrymore had just three years earlier won our hearts as Gerty in E.T. Here she recreates the same sense of wonder; she's perhaps not a great actress, but certainly has a remarkable gift of screen aura.

As the top of his game, though, is Sandler. OK, maybe he could never do Hamlet (although Keanu Reeves did, so...), but he certainly can entertain. The key to his charisma is an intelligent, unique brand of self-critical, boyish, sometimes wildly offensive humor. This works best when he strips down the idea of love. Anyone who admired Sandler's tribute to his red sweater on "Saturday Night Live" will be easily taken by his innocent, playful ways here.

The Wedding Singer even dares to include subtext. Comedic remarks are made about the bad effects of alcohol: "Have a few drinks and drive home!" says Sandler to his enemy.

But mainly, the film dares to be different from the other stand-up movie vehicles like Tommy Boy and Sandler's own ventures. Working as a perfect foil to the souped-up romances out right now, it's a Valentine's Day present even a naked Gwyneth Paltrow can't beat. B

Short stories examine city life

By Prudence Heller

DON'T ERASE ME
Carolyn Ferrell
Houghton Mifflin

In Carolyn Ferrell's short story collection, Don't Erase Me (Houghton Mifflin, $20), the world of black teen-agers in New York's South Bronx is so dreary at first glance that it staggers the imagination.

But, hey, these are people. And where there are people, there are glimmers.

So Glory might be beaten up from time to time and mocked for her "Tiger-Frame Glasses" and scorned as "kooky" by her schoolmates because of that notebook she carries in her schoolbag. But the stories she has written in that notebook are the world she has made for herself — a good world where dreams can come true and where the three girls of the "Helper Squad" go to the aid of old women who spill their groceries, small boys knocked off bicycles, the neighborhood bum and the like.

Toya and Bri, in "Do You Know My Name?" decide they'll become wives in high school. Bri is pregnant by a white boy who wants to marry her. Some of her classmates think she has it made. But has she?

In the title story, a young mother looks back on the years since she got the AIDS virus. Her mother, once loving, now scolds. Her stepfather used to make passes at her. From the window of her red-wallpapered apartment she watches Melody, who actually got a college degree, it's said, but now is a crazy, grooming and talking to a pack of dogs. She remembers a friend whose mother insisted he be buried, not cremated, thereby defying superstition that burying AIDS victims could pollute the graveyard.

Most of the stories are told in the jargon of the South Bronx, with plenty of four-letter words.

The last three stories have a different theme — about a 12-year-old girl, with a black father and German mother, who must adjust after her family splits up. Ferrell herself is part-black, part-German.

Lucy Lawless tops trendsetter list

NEW YORK (AP) — While writing Good Will Hunting, up-and-coming actors Matt Damon and Ben Affleck never worried about seeing things eye-to-eye.

"We're pretty inseparable, in terms of our experiences," Damon says in the Feb. 13 Entertainment Weekly. "We look at things in exactly the same way. It wasn't like someone was good at structure and someone at dialogue. The only difference between us is Ben can type."

The drama starring Damon, 27, as a mathematical genius working as a janitor and Affleck, 25, as his blue-collar pal has earned both rave reviews, and a shared Golden Globe for best screenplay. The longtime friends who met as kids in Boston 17 years ago are enjoying similar success stories. Damop's other credits include Courage Under Fire and the upcoming films Saving Private Ryan and Rounders. Affleck costarred in Chasing Amy and worked opposite Bruce Willis in the upcoming summer epic Armageddon.

In March, they begin filming the new Kevin Smith movie Dogma together and then split up for separate European filming schedules. They plan to write a script together, via fax when work separates them.

Xena: Warrior Princess star Lucy Lawless and talk-show hostess Rosie O'Donnell are not just entertainers, they're fashion waiting to happen.

Lawless topped People magazine's Top 10 Trendsetters of 1998 list in its Feb. 16 double issue. The Amazon's contribution: clean-cut bangs. O'Donnell rounded out the list for "sparking a new attiude in queen-sized tailored pantsuits."

At No. 2 was actress Claire Danes, praised for her short-sleeved sweaters and long skirts. Third was singer Maxwell for his open shirts and chokers, followed by Winona Ryder for her use of vintage clothes.

Cameron Diaz placed fifth for reviving 1950s chic with scarves and tight sweaters. "No Doubt" rocker Gwen Stefani was sixth for making striped track pants cool again.

Brandy was seventh for repopularizing the prom dress, George Strait was next for his tailored mandarin-collar tuxedo and Tea Leoni was ninth for her wide pants and pearls.

Mariel Hemingway isn't about to run away from the family name or its often-troubled history.

The actress nominated for an Academy Award 18 years ago for Manhattan is heading behind the camera to direct a film based on a book by grandfather Ernest Hemingway: A Moveable Feast.

"It's really the love story of my grandfather and of Hadley, my grandmother," Ms. Hemingway says in Sunday's Parade magazine, referring to the first of Hemingway's four wives.

A fuller view of her famous ancestor will come from her husband, documentary filmmaker Steve Crisman, who is working on a movie about Ernest Hemingway's adventurous and emotionally turbulent life.

Both productions are being made for The Arts & Entertainment cable network.

Ms. Hemingway, who did little acting work in the 1990s, is closing out the decade with a bang. She had a small part in the latest Woody Allen film, Deconstucting Harry, and has starring roles in the upcoming films Little Men, Road Ends with Dennis Hopper, Drop Dead and American Reel, both co-starring David Carradine.

The mother of two daughters, ages 10 and 8, also appeared in a TBS special to be broadcast Feb. 22 about Panama's threatened rain forest.

Eagleson ousted; News wants no bikinis

TORONTO (AP) — Alan Eagleson was shown the door at Canada's Hall of Fame.

The disgraced hockey impressario and founder of the NHL Players Association was the first ever expelled from the hall.

"The board felt it had to act in the best interests of the hall," said executive director Allan Stewart.

Eagleson, disbarred as a lawyer, pleaded guilty to skimming profits earmarked for NHL pension funds from Hockey Canada and Labatt's. He was also fined $1 million for mail fraud in the United States.

He also faces a class-action suit by former NHL players who claim he conspired with the league and its teams to keep salaries down.

Eagleson's ouster from the Canadian hall, encompassing every sport, does not affect his status in the Hockey Hall of Fame, yet. "We are going to review the Alan Eagleson situation at our March 31 meeting," said Hockey Hall of Fame chairman Scotty Morrison.

Gordie Howe, a member of both halls of fame, said he hoped the hockey hall would follow the sports hall's lead.

"It's a good beginning," said Howe. "It cheapens the hall if you have someone like Eagleson in it.

Other former hockey greats said they would relinquish their places in the hockey hall if Eagleson remains a member.

ST. LOUIS (AP) — Sports Illustrated and other sports magazines have their annual swimsuit editions. Now, The Sporting News has the anti-swimsuit issue: a cover featuring a burly football player wearing a bikini.

"It's a spoof on Sports Illustrated, but also a little bit more of a comment about the fact that a lot of sports fans don't want swimsuit issues," said John Rawlings, editor of The Sporting News.

Sports Illustrated spokeswoman Robin Shallow said 55 million readers can't be wrong. That's the number of people, including 19 million women, who will read the swimsuit edition, she said. The Sporting News anti-swimsuit edition arrives at newsstands Wednesday — the same day Sports Illustrated's swimsuit issue shows up.

"We did this very calculatingly so people will see their swimsuit cover on the newsstand and ours, hopefully, next to it," Rawlings said.

The contrast will be obvious. Sports Illustrated features German model Heidi Klum on its cover. The Sporting News has a man wearing a football helmet, bikini top and bottom, and a menacing glare. The cover headline reads, "Swimsuits Don't Fit Us."

In addition to Sports Illustrated, Sport and Inside Sport magazines also have them.

The Sporting News anti-swimsuit cover is for newsstand buyers only. Subscribers will see a cover featuring Indiana Pacers coach Larry Bird.

OKLAHOMA CITY (AP) — Olympic gold medal winner Shannon Miller hasn't decided whether she'll try for the U.S. gymnastics team for the 2000 Olympics.

"It's not out of the question," Miller said. "I'm starting to train a little more seriously, but school is more of a priority right now."

Miller, who turns 21 next month, is a sophomore at Oklahoma and still makes about 100 personal appearances each year.

When she isn't in school or practicing on the balance beam, Miller is taking figure skating lessons.

"I don't know if I'm any good at it," Miller said. "It hasn't really hurt, but I've taken my share of falls."

Miller won the gold medal on the balance beam at the 1996 games in Atlanta and was part of the American team that took the gold that year.

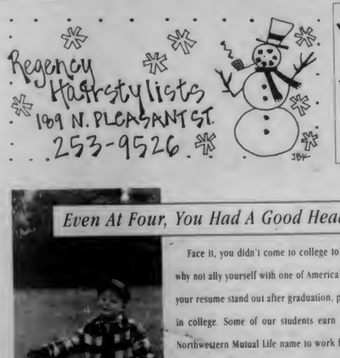
CAROLINA, Puerto Rico (AP) — Three-time boxing champion Wilfredo Gomez is in a drug rehabilitation program in hopes of evading drug abuse charges against him.



Gomez was arrested Dec. 8 when police said they found him using cocaine in a parked car on a beach.

Under Puerto Rican law, drug charges could be dropped if Gomez proves he has kicked drug addiction. Gomez's lawyer, Francisco Valcarcel, said the former boxer was being treated by a psychiatrist in Carolina, a suburb of San Juan.

Gomez on Tuesday waived his right to a preliminary hearing, which would have given him an opportunity to answer allegations by police before being officially charged by the judge. Another court hearing was set for March 9.

The 41-year-old Gomez held the WBC's super bantamweight and featherweight titles and the world junior lightweight title in the 1980s.

Since retiring in 1991, he has been arrested on domestic violence and previous cocaine possession charges.

The match-up to look for will be in the backcourt, where the Minutemen will once again need to contain the potent Ram duo of Wheeler and Mobley. In their first match-up Wheeler scored only two points in the first 30 minutes, by which time UMass had built a comfortable lead.

The star of the first meeting was sophomore center Ajmal Basit, who pulled down 19 rebounds to go along with 15 points. With both Lari Ketner and Tyrone Weeks on the bench with early foul trouble, Basit played the best game of his young career to lead Massachusetts past the Rams.

Minuteman Notes: UMass junior guard Charlton Clarke was named A-10 co-Player of the Week for his efforts in wins over No. 21 Xavier, La Salle and Duquesne last week. Clarke averaged 18.7 points and 4.7 assists, and has now won the honor twice.., According to the latest Sagarin rankings (Feb. 11), UMass' 1997–1998 schedule is the eighth toughest in the country. The Minutemen have played 10 teams that were ranked in the Top 25 at some point this season, and have gone 4–6 in those contests. UMass is 15–0 against non-ranked teams this season.

Michael Jordan. His Airness has reiterated over and over again that he will play under no one but Jackson, end of story.

With MJ's departure Chicago's misfit will be left squirming behind. The Bulls organization has made it known many a time that they are simply tired of Dennis's misbehavior and antics. In case you didn't know, the only reason he is around this season is because Michael asked for him.

Rounding up the herd would be Scottie Pippen, for sure as mentioned earlier he will be traded at the end of the season.

Finale — Enter the king... Jordan. Since his entrance into the NBA, Jordan has had a profound and unforgettable influence on both the game and its fans. His accomplishments and achievements both on and off the court are simply immeasurable.

Michael Jordan has come to be an icon, role model and idol of people all over the world. He is an athlete, a millionaire, a businessman. He conducts himself properly and — most importantly — he is a family man with "values."

Jordan has been labeled as supposedly perfect, flawless in every way, the perfect role model for the children of America and the people of the rest of the world.

News flash folks, no one is perfect, including his Airness. Remember that earlier line "a family man with values?" Well the father of three and world renowned superstar is allegedly rumored to be filing for a divorce. MJ is allegedly rumored to be currently living with a woman in the south end of Chicago. As to the truth of this rumor, well only the lord of lay-ups himself knows the answer.

However, if there is indeed any truth to this rumor, what does it say of America's "ideal role-model." A father of three young children rumored to be leaving his wife and family for another woman. Kind of defines the world of deceit and corruption, and at the same time it almost proves the fact that even the world of sports can't stand clear of it all.

an eighth place finish in the 55m dash, running his fastest time of the season — 6.47 — and defeating Price, the school record holder in that event, by .04.

Seniors Brian Chabot and Ryan Carrara also recorded season bests in the 1000m and the 3000m, respectively. Chabot placed 12th with a time of 2:30.38 and Carrara landed 13th place with an 8:22.92 performance, both competing against stiff competition.

Still, the real test comes Saturday, as the Minutemen attempt to place higher than fourth overall, their best finish ever in the indoor Atlantic 10 championships.

"We've worked the scores out with possible scenarios," O'Brien said. "Regardless of how we score it, Virginia Tech comes out with more than twice the total of the second place team. They generally have around 200 points, where the second place team ends up with about 90. There are four or five teams that will get between 70 and 90. I don't want to say that we always ranked ourselves at 70 and Rhode Island at 90, but there's no way to tell. We need to find that 20 points. We're fighting for second place.

"We are what we are and we've got to compete at our maximum level. The other teams are the same way, though."

Leading the charge will be pole vaulter Albie Vasquez, who is the top-ranked vaulter in the conference. All three relay squads hold seats in the top four, and Concepcion will enter the meet ranked third in the 400m. Price and Toye will line up in the third and fourth slots, respectively, in the 200m.

A second place in the Atlantic 10s would be a historical finish for the UMass men's indoor track team, and considering the strength of the frontrunning Hokies, that is conceivably the highest place they can fight for.

"We'd like to think that we're in the thick of the conference championship, but we're not," O'Brien said. "Virginia Tech is too deep and too strong."

Even second will be a dogfight, and the Minutemen are prepared for the struggle.

"The conference is stronger this year than it has been ever before by a large margin," O'Brien said.

While the men's team has almost assured itself a place further along in the postseason, the women's squad moved one step closer in its climb to be the fourth-best team in its conference, as the Minutewomen finished fourth in the slalom and fifth in the giant slalom for the second consecutive weekend.

"It was a good weekend for both the men's and women's teams," MacConnell said. "It's going to be tough for the women, though. We will have to finish above Smith College to qualify."

Without the services of projected second-skier Katie Keane, who tore her ACL on the final day of practice, the Minutewomen are still searching for someone to emerge as a consistent skier to anchor the attack of senior Leah Mullero, who appears to be in the midst of her third All-American campaign after another impressive showing last weekend.

The Marshfield native finished a UMass-best fifth in both the slalom and giant slalom. Picking up some of the slack for the injured Keane was promising freshman Margaret LaBombard, who skied her way to a solid 18th-place finish in the slalom — second-best for the Minutewomen in the event.

Last weekend marked the close of the regular season for both UMass squads, which will travel to Waterville Valley, N.H. this weekend for the United States College Ski Association (USCSA) Regionals. As the women hope to qualify for further action with a solid showing at Waterville Valley, the men's team, as well as their veteran coach, has set high expectations for itself, anticipating a top finish.

"[The men's squad] has the potential to win it all because the competition is, for the most part, within our league," MacConnell said. "We're going up there with a positive attitude for both teams. We'll try to ski our personal best, and see what happens."

UMass Notes: To no one's surprise, Holden, McCormack and Mullero have already qualified for the NCAA Regionals, which will be held at the Middlebury Snow Bowl in Vermont a week from Saturday. Both Holden and Mullero are previous regional competitors, while McCormack, after his breakthrough performance last weekend, will be a newcomer to the event.

U.S. women win first–ever women's hockey gold

By Margaret Lillard
Associated Press

NAGANO, Japan — The gold medal would have been special no matter what team the United States beat. That it came against Canada made it perfect.

With 21 saves from Sarah Tueting and aggressive, intelligent play, the U.S. team defeated Canada 3-1 yesterday to capture the first Olympic women's hockey title.

Four times since 1990, the Americans fell to the Canadians in the Women's World Championship. And in the months leading up to the Olympics, the rivals played 13 times with Canada winning seven.

"Canada's always had the edge, but throughout the tournament we gained confidence," the United States' Sara DeCosta said. "We played them so many times, got to know them so well, we knew we could beat them."

And after they did — in the most important game of all — they celebrated like only champions do.

After Sandra Whyte scored into an empty net with eight seconds left to clinch it, Tueting leaped into the air and kicked up her heavily padded legs in a funky celebratory dance.

At the buzzer, sticks and gloves flew skyward as the U.S. team emptied the bench and mobbed Tueting. Defenseman Angela Ruggiero skated the length of the ice to grab the puck from the Canadian end, then threw her helmet in the air as alternate captain Karyn Bye wrapped a flag around herself.

The Canadians were left to stand glumly on the ice with bronze medalist Finland, waiting while the U.S. players went into their locker room.

"When you see it's silver," Canada captain Stacy Wilson said, "it kind of kicks your butt."

Canadian coach Shannon Miller said she felt "emptiness," but said her feelings changed when she saw the gold medal going around the neck of U.S. captain Cammi Granato.

"I had a feeling of joy go through my body because I realized an Olympic gold medal was being hung on a female hockey player," Miller said, "and I couldn't believe the impact it had on me."

Of the U.S.-Canada rivalry, she said: "I guess the gap's been closed."

It was the second time the Americans defeated their rivals in four days and gave the United States its first Olympic hockey gold medal since the men's team pulled off the Miracle on Ice in 1980. Before the game, Bye received a note from Bill Baker, a member of the '80 squad and a player Bye emulated as an 8-year-old. Baker wore No. 6; Bye's number.

"Good luck," the note said. "I'll be watching you go for the gold."

Bye led the parade out of the locker room for the medal ceremony, fists clenched over her head, then hugged Granato as the two teammates lined up on either side of Tueting.

The U.S. women, who went 6-0 during the Olympics and outscored their opponents 36-8, held hands while waiting for their gold medals and waved small American flags.

"We were talking about who was going to be on the Wheaties box," U.S. forward Alana Blahoski said. "We were told it was going to be Dacabo Street or us. Why not us?"

both challenges thrown their way. UMass demoralized the University of Vermont on its home court, before knocking off a feisty University of Hartford team at the same location.

Both matches were annihilations as UMass posted 7–0 match point victories in each competition.

"These victories give me a very good indication of where the team is at," UMass coach Judy Dixon said. "The entire program has been raised to a higher level now."

There were obviously plenty of bright spots for UMass all weekend, with Dixon listing the play of Alex Aller, Bo Navarro and the doubles play in general as highlights.

"I am so pleased to get the doubles point in both matches, Dixon said. That is the type of tennis we must get back to.

"Furthermore, it is great to see Alex and Bo coming around at just the right time. We will need them to solidify the middle of our order the rest of the way."

The singles play was also superb in Vermont, with flu- ridden Todd Cheney leading the way.

Cheney took care of Chris Wilson from Vermont, 6–1, 6–2 and Nemagna Bala from Hartford, 6–3, 6–2.

Rob Manchester was equally impressive in his new role as No. 2 singles player. He rolled by Myles Webster from Vermont, 6–3, 6–4, and Srda Tapuskovic of Hartford, 6–1, 7–6.

Aller won a spirited three–set match over Charles Paget of Vermont.

"This was a big win for me," Aller said. "I came out here with the flu, and that affected my play at first, but then the momentum took over and I was able to come out on top."

Aller had an easier time with Scott Heleniak of Hartford, beating him straight sets, 7–5, 6–3.

In the lower half of singles play, Navarro and Kevin Curley won two straight set matches, and Parsa Samii pulled out a three–set win over Chris Gathman of Vermont, before finishing off Dan Mork, 6–1, 6–2.

An important element of the UMass victories was the doubles play. The Minutemen struggled in this department throughout the fall season.

UMass won all six matches this weekend, with Cheney and Manchester anchoring the attack.

"All of our teams played well, but I was especially pleased with the No. 2 team of Aller and Navarro," Dixon said. "They play really well together, and that is important for us."

"I really enjoy playing with Bo," Aller said. "We have really good chemistry and we play the same style of tennis. I'm looking forward to playing with him and contributing to the team."

"The whole lineup was solid this weekend," Dixon said. "The way they played says a lot about this team. They have a lot to be proud of right now."

Attention all club, intramural and recreational athletes:

This is a big campus, with a lot of talented athletes. But not everybody plays at the varsity level. We know that. The Collegian sports page wants to recognize the efforts you give on the field, even though you may not wear a standard issue UMass uniform.

Therefore, we have Sports Briefs. Briefs is a weekly (or semi–weekly, depending on the response) column devoted to the non–varsity athletes. But in order to get Briefs off the ground, we need your help.

To get your club or team into the column jot down some info — the results of your last game, an upcoming event, etc. along with a contact name and phone number — and bring it down to 113 Campus Center Basement, or fax it to 545–1592, attention Sports Briefs.

As soon as we get enough info, Briefs will make its appearance. Any questions? Call Casey Kane at 545–0719.

Thanks.

Men's hoop looks to extend lead in East

Minutemen could solidify No. 1 seed with a victory

By Luke Meredith
Collegian Staff

It looks as though Rhode Island is the team with something to prove.

The No. 18 Massachusetts men's basketball team's surprising romp through the Atlantic 10 has included some pretty big road wins, the biggest of which may have been on Jan. 29 at URI.

The Minutemen (19–6, 11–1 A–10) began that night with an unbeaten conference record, but faced skepticism as to whether they could unseat the A–10 hierarchy. Though they were playing like the UMass of old, few still saw them as the UMass of old.

But Massachusetts ended that night as the undisputed frontrunner by blowing out Rhode Island, 74–57, before a sold–out Providence Civic Center, and proved all it had to prove to the rest of the A–10 in the process. UMass hasn't looked back since, and tonight's rematch at the William D. Mullins Center (7:30 p.m., Atlantic 10 Television Network, WHMP–FM, WMUA–FM) will be less about proving a point and more about cementing the A–10 East's No. 1 seed for the conference tournament. With a win over the Rams, the Minutemen will clinch a first–round bye in the A–10 tournament.

But the Rams enter tonight's game with more than enough motivation. Along with a crushing loss to the Minutemen in their first meeting, URI will also have Saturday's home loss to Temple fresh in its mind. Temple jumped out to a big early lead, survived a late Ram run and beat URI, 68–67, moving into a tie for second in the A–10 East.

URI is also hoping to break its own "UMass jinx," a jinx that has seen them drop 10 straight to Massachusetts. Seniors Tyson Wheeler, Cuttino Mobley and Josh King have never beaten UMass, a fact they admit plays on their minds.

"It just hurts knowing that we've never beaten them," King said after losing to the Minutemen in January. "This is the best team we've had in awhile, and we thought [this might be the year]."

Tonight's game doesn't really hold the significance many thought it would when the schedule came out. Massachusetts is not only in first place in the A–10 — something nobody predicted in November — but well in front of URI and Temple. A 2–2 record over the last four games of the regular season will probably give UMass its sixth A–10 regular season title in the '90s.

Soap opera of NBA keeps dragging on

This weeks episode of "Days of our NBA Lives" will be starring ex–Marcus Camby teammate Damon Stoudamire playing the role of new team inspiration, Anfernee Hardway playing the Devils Advocate leaving Disney World for Disneyland, the Golden State strangler played by Latrell Sprewell, society's misfit "The Worm" himself Dennis Rodman, soon–to–be–traded shadow man Scottie Pippen, and finally the star of our show... his "Airness" Michael Jordan playing the role of "America's ideal family man?"

Act I, Scene I — Yes, it is official. The Toronto Raptors are slowly but surely beginning to self destruct. This past Friday the Raptors were involved in a multi–player deal with the Portland Trailblazers. Involved in this trade was one of Toronto's key players and NBA stars, Stoudamire.

After successfully passing his physical Stoudamire is "officially" a Trailblazer. One can expect to find him being rewarded with bench blisters for a week or so until all players involved in the trade pass their physicals as required by NBA policy.

The Raptors will now begin to embark on an already familiar road. The road of gradual and imminent decline, in both their record and style of play.

Granted they can't get much worse than they are now, carrying a record of 11–20. But, come on, you just don't dump a stylistic marquee player like Damon. Why not get rid of non–productive UMass alum Camby?

Act I Scene II — With Hardway looking to leave Orlando their are a number of possibilities out there. A leader and star with the abilities of Penny can bring something great to any team. Only one true flaw has been recognized in the man, and that is his dominating ego.

Justin Rudd on the NBA

One awesome trade possibility would be the reuniting of Shaquille O'Neal and Hardway. Just think how big the Lakers would be with a little Penny. I think that this is a very strong possibility with the Lakers being frustrated by Nick Van Exel's rumored "unhappiness" in Tinsel Town.

Act II Scene I — Enter the Golden State Strangler. Do you remember the "alleged" choking incident involving Sprewell and Golden State Warriors head coach P.J. Carlesimo? Well, court has been adjourned. The Sprewell arbitration hearing concluded after 7 1/2 hours of closing arguments. Arbitrator John Ferrick now has the ball in his end of the court with the ability to issue his decision at any time within the next 30 days.

Act II Scene II — The misfit, the crossdresser, the individual, "The Worm," Rodman. This week in Rodman news where has "The Worm" squirmed to?

Dennis Rodman has skipped practice for the second straight time with Da' Bulls. Monday, Rodman just happened to miss practice, yet attended a team workout yesterday, leaving him questionable for action in last night's match–up against Boston's best, Larry Bird, and his hometown Indiana Pacers.

Dennis the Menace also supposedly "accidentally" lost his car keys, which resulted in him being unable to make it to practice. Oh, like he couldn't get a ride from M.L., Scottie or one of his friends. Or for that matter what about one of his other cars, I mean Michael owns five. The Worm only owns one? At any rate as a result of missing that practice Rodman didn't start against Grant Hill and his Detroit Pistons this past Sunday.

When asked about the situation head coach Phil Jackson said simply that Rodman would be fined.

Act III Scene I — Scottie Pippen, who is the man behind the shadow? As we all know Pippen has been playing in the shadow of Michael Jordan for what seems to be an eternity.

An old wise man once told me "Based on experience I have found that all great dynasties eventually fall."

Well I believe that the old wise man was right. I think that it is safe to say that the Chicago dynasty will soon fall.

Earlier this season Scottie was injured and demanded to be traded. As we all know he wasn't, but mark my words "Scottie Pippen will not be dressed in a Bulls uniform next season." You can quote me on that, folks.

At any rate Da' Bulls will be deconstructed at the end of the season, a wrecking ball will hit Chicago and the Windy City may never recover. The fall of the Empire will be led by the head coach himself, Phil Jackson. Jackson has this obscene desire to retire, raise his family and live happily in the country.

He will be followed by the best player in basketball today

Track preps for A-10 Championships

Dave Cahill was part of UMass' record–breaking 4x400m relay team this weekend at the Valentine Invitational.

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's indoor track and field team spent Valentine's Day doing what it's been doing all winter long: preparing for the season ending championship meets.

At the Valentine Invitational at Boston University, the Minutemen had their last meet before the Atlantic 10 Championships on Feb. 21 at the University of Rhode Island in Kingston.

The annual invitational is a nonscoring meet at which many of the best teams in the nation convene to build up some steam that will hopefully propel them to their respective conference titles.

In the Atlantic 10 conference, however, a championship will be nearly impossible to come by this year for all but one participant.

"The meet went well, and now we'll turn our attention toward the conference championship," UMass coach Ken O'Brien said. "The clear cut favorite is Virginia Tech. Nobody's going to muster enough to challenge them. Four or five schools will then fight it out for second, and that's pretty much what happened last year as well."

In what has become a seemingly ritual practice, senior Scott Price thrusted himself into the upcoming A–10s by breaking the school 200m record with a time of 21.68. He joined classmate Dave Cahill and juniors Tom Toye and Neil Concepcion to tear down the UMass 4x400m relay mark at the Invitational as well, running a 3:13.75 race.

The distance medley team, which consists of Matt Ely, Dan Leboeuf, Mike Marchand and Doug Gush, qualified for the New England Championships and the IC4A Championships with a time of 10:18.60 at Boston University this past weekend, which placed them second.

Toye prepared himself for the all important A–10s with

After four years of hard work, Massachusetts ski captain Eric McCormack is finally reaping the benefits of his diligence, posting two team–best finishes last weekend at the Smith College Tournament held at Berkshire East Mountain.

Having skied in the shadow of UMass All–American Tom Holden nearly all season, McCormack, a senior, stepped into the spotlight in his regular season finale with a third–place finish in Saturday's men's slalom, and a seventh–place finish in the giant slalom on Sunday.

"I realized that it was the last regular season race of my career," said the Lenox native, who began the season as the team's fourth skier on the depth chart. "I wanted to do a little something more, and I put everything on the line."

With his impressive performances and steady improvement, McCormack powered his Minutemen to third– place showings in both events, keeping them amongst the elite in the Eastern College Ski Conference.

"Eric has made giant strides as a skier with us," said 38– year UMass coaching veteran Bill MacConnell. "He has gotten to be one of the best skiers in the league over time. His progress has been very impressive."

Not to be outdone by McCormack's feats was UMass' top skier, Tom Holden, who finished right behind his teammate in the slalom at fourth, and a solid ninth in the giant slalom. Sophomore newcomer John Griffin added a 13th–place finish in Sunday's giant slalom.

From all early indications, all is well for the Massachusetts men's tennis team.

The squad headed into Vermont this past weekend with a variety of ailments and injuries, not the least of which included a feeling of uncertainty.

Dear UMass Students:

I just wanted to thank everyone that attended the Temple game for your support. That was the old Mullins atmosphere. You don't know how special that was for me and the team to play in an atmosphere like that. Even though the outcome of the game wasn't what we all would have liked, the student support certainly was fantastic.

We have two more huge conference home games and I am excited about seeing the same craziness in the Mullins Center that we had versus Temple. Make it difficult for Rhode Island and St. Joseph's to come into our house. When you come out in force and support us, the Mullins Center is one of the toughest places in America to play.

Peace negotiations on hold in Dublin

DUBLIN, Ireland (AP) — The IRA's political ally clung to its place in Northern Ireland peace negotiations yesterday, resisting attempts all week by the British and Irish governments to expel it for recent killings blamed on the Irish Republican Army.

The other six participating parties gave up and went home after three days of talks in Dublin Castle — without a single word of real negotiations being uttered.

Sinn Fein blocked a joint government verdict on its expulsion by pursuing its own injunction from the Irish High Court.

The court action prevented negotiators from discussing the intended topic of new governmental structures between the British-ruled north and independent Irish Republic, a key part of any peace settlement.

"I'd just like to express the sense of disappointment I'm sure we all feel that the last three days spent in Dublin have been overwhelmed by discussions on the position of Sinn Fein within the talks," said Mo Mowlam, Britain's minister responsible for governing Northern Ireland.

Mowlam accused Sinn Fein on Monday of violating the principles of nonviolence that govern the talks.

CNN, ABC dispute over Clinton coverage

NEW YORK (AP) — President Clinton's security advisers weren't the only people facing heckers at yesterday's town meeting on Iraq: CNN also was catching heat from competitors upset about its handling of the event.

ABC complained that CNN's restrictions on covering the 90-minute town meeting made it difficult to report on protests that erupted when Clinton administration officials tried to explain why an attack on Iraq may be necessary.

"We would have loved to have cameras in the event," said ABC spokeswoman Eileen Murphy. "We would have loved to have covered the protesters. We were not allowed to do that."

CNN's rivals were angry about the event from the start. The Clinton administration chose CNN to carry the town meeting in part because of the cable news network's ability to carry it live internationally, including in Baghdad.

Competing networks won some concessions from CNN after protesting to the White House late Tuesday. For instance, CNN had initially said other networks would not be allowed to send video or audio footage to their affiliates around the nation. But the network relented and allowed it.

Still, non-CNN video photographers and still photographers from other news organizations were not permitted into the town meeting.

Administration, GEO return to negotiations

By Jason Eiseman
Collegian Staff

Before the Graduate Employee Organization's (GEO) declared deadline, University of Massachusetts Chancellor David K. Scott announced yesterday afternoon the administration will honor GEO's request for mediation and not implement the administration's final contract offer.

"This is a most unfortunate development, and we hope that it can be resolved quickly so that we can proceed with the stipend increases which we believe are essential," Scott said in a press release.

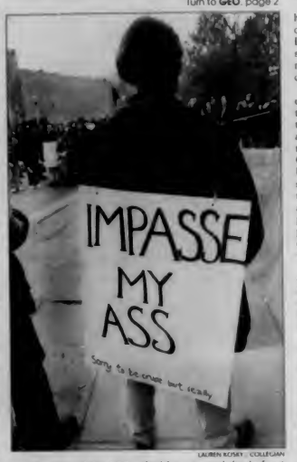
At 10 a.m. yesterday, Scott met with representatives from other campus labor unions on the labor council on GEO's behalf. These union representatives urged Scott to go to mediation, rather than end negotiations.

GEO held a membership meeting last night to discuss the mediation process. It was attended by approximately 450 members.

"We've agreed to the names of three private mediators, hopefully we'll be at the table as early as the end of this week," said Jon Zerolnick, co-chief negotiator for GEO. He credited the mobilization and readiness of GEO members with getting the administration back to the table.

"I don't think they expected members to be as frustrated or as ready as they were," Zerolnick said.

Scott and Sue Pearson, chief negotiator for the administration, said their side has acted in accordance with Massachusetts State laws.



Despite the administration coming back to the negotiating table, Zerolnick said GEO has no plans to withdraw the charge of unfair labor practice filed last week with the Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission.

Last Friday, the administration ended two years of contract negotiations by declaring an impasse. GEO claimed the declaration of impasse by the administration was illegal because they did not go through the required mediation process.

"[Yesterday] was a great a victory for our union," said Mahmood Ketabchi, GEO president. "The declaration of impasse was a threat to everyone," Ketabchi said.

"We'd like to get the thing done as soon as possible," Ketabchi said. "I don't know what they were thinking in their minds when they declared impasse, but they obviously made a mistake."

UMass police enact 24–hr. crime hotline for anonymous tips

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

A 24–hour anonymous crime tip line has been established by the University of Massachusetts Public Safety Department in an effort to encourage students to report information they may have regarding campus crime.

The new phone line exists independently of the UMass phone system. It is attached to an answering machine in the department's Community Disorder Unit and is not a line students should access to receive immediate attention from the police department. Only personnel from that department will have access to the messages left on the machine.

"You can call with information day or night, regarding any past, current, or future incident. You need not give your name when giving us information," UMass Chief of Police John Luippold said.

According to Luippold, the installation of this phone line is just one way UMass police are trying to be proactive in their attempts to work with students.

"We are trying to be proactive, creative with technology and work in partnership with the campus community to enhance public safety in any way we can," Luippold said.

Luippold said the September 1997 death of junior Adam Prentice in was a catalyst for the crime tip line.

Prentice died last September due to injuries sustained in a fall through a greenhouse roof at the Morrill Science Center. The investigation surrounding his death is still open. To date, no individuals have come forward to aid police.

According to Luippold, the tip line originated because of the police department's failed attempts to determine Prentice's whereabouts the last half hour or hour before his death.

> "This is an opportunity for individuals to leave us information about incidents they may want us to know about..."
> — UMass Chief of Police John Luippold

"We see this as one more opportunity for individuals to pass information on to us about that night," Luippold said.

However, UMass police encourage students to use the phone line to relay information about any crime.

"This is an opportunity for individuals to leave us information about incidents they may want us to know about but are concerned about coming forward with information," Luippold said.

Examples of incidents the public safety department encourages students to leave information about are vehicle break–ins, peeping toms in residence halls and campus vandalism.

Students who have information regarding a crime should call the tip line at 577–TIPS (8477). Anyone who wishes to contact from the Community Disorders Unit should call 545– 0893 or the main police number at 545–2121.

Award assistance at UM

By Lorraine Kennedy
Collegian Staff

A pilot program to help students apply for prestigious national scholarships and fellowships has been launched on the University of Massachusetts campus.

Currently located within the Honors Program, the Office of National Scholarship Advancement (ONSA) has been granted funding from the state's Board of Higher Education to increase the number of national scholarship winners from the state's public institutions of higher education.

"We have many tremendously talented and motivated students here at UMass who certainly qualify for these prestigious scholarships," said ONSA's interim director Chris Felton in a press release,"but to date, no help has been available to guide them through the selections and application process."

The services provided by ONSA will be available to all UMass students. In addition, office staff will work very close with faculty to identify and begin preparing students who may be potential candidates for national scholarship awards, Felton said.

ONSA will provide interested students with information about qualifications and deadlines about scholarships, as well as guidance toward building a strong resumé. In addition, staff members will help student apply and develop the skills needed for interviewing and writing personal statements.

The office will also work with the Graduate School and International Programs Office on fellowships which involve student eligibility from these offices.

"Competition for these awards is intense," Felton said. "The application process is extremely rigorous and ideally begins early during a student's college career."

According to Felton, other public institutions that have created similar offices have reported increases in the number of successful applicants for the highly sought–after fellowships and grants.

The following is a list of the scholarships for which the office will provide support: Rhodes Scholarship, Marshall Scholarship, Fulbright Grant, Goldwater Scholarship, Truman Scholarship, Public Policy and International Affairs Fellowship, Mellon Fellowship in the Humanities, National Security Education Program (NSEP) Undergraduate Scholarships and NSEP Graduate Fellowships, Morris Udall Scholarships, James Madison Fellowships, Phi Kappa Phi National Fellowship, Elie Weisel Essay Competition and the USA Today All–USA Academic Award.

Though the program is not yet in full operation, Felton expects to begin contacting interested students within the month.

For further information, students should go to the Honors Program office, located in 504 Goodell Hall, or call 545– 2483.

SGA focuses on campus safety, dorm security during last night's meeting

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Speaker of the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) Peter Kilbourne held an emergency meeting of the senate last night to get student business done.

During the last SGA meeting no motion concerning the student body was passed. Concerned by this, Kilbourne called for an emergency meeting of the SGA.

"It's time the Senate got some business done," Kilbourne said.

Senator Jodi Bailey (Commuter – at large) also stressed the need to focus the meetings on working for the students.

"We have been overlooking the fact we have a job. We are here to represent the student body... we are not here for each other, but the 18,000 people who put us here," Bailey said.

The SGA accomplished its goal as several motions were passed last night concerning the student body.

In an effort to show the administration that students want a safer campus, a motion was passed unanimously to add more lighting and make a clear path by the road leading from the Sylvan Residential Area to purple parking lot.

"This brings to the administration that there is a need for a path," said Senator Craig Cincotta (Sylvan – at large), who proposed the motion. "This is one of the issues ranking high on the women's safety walk recently."

Bailey, using actions to support her call for a focus on working for the students, proposed a motion that would save some students money.

The motion would lower the cost of a resume disk students buy from the Career Center. The actual cost of the disk is $8.50. The Career Center adds a $5.00 fee in case the disk is used after the student graduates.

"Only one–third of people use it after graduation. It wasn't a huge cost to them if [the Career Center had to pay when] people use it after graduation," Bailey said.

The motion passed unanimously.

Bailey also proposed a motion to establish a committee that would create a dialogue between the two people that help students plan a career. A dialogue between career counselors and academic advisors make a safety net for students when they are planning their careers, the motion said.

"These offices, working in coordination with one another, would create a safety net for students in terms of a career... the Chancellor would establish a committee in order to help facilitate discussion between these offices," Bailey said in the motion.

The motion is only a recommendation to the Chancellor, and passed unanimously.

A motion prompted by comments from Amherst Selectman Hill Boss was also passed unanimously. The motion condemned his comments and requested an apology for statements made by Boss in a recent article appearing in the Daily Hampshire Gazette.

Boss is requested to make the apology in the Gazette and the Clinton scandal studied

By Laura A. Jakutowicz
Collegian Correspondent

Questions about where President Clinton stands on such policies as Health Care and Welfare reform were the focus of a study by three University of Massachusetts communications professors.

The study, which involved 600 people across the United States, was conducted by telephone. The findings overwhelmingly suggested that the average American knows more about Clinton's alleged affairs than where he stands on policies.

Although 77 percent of viewers say the media is spending too much time on the Monica Lewinsky story, they believed Clinton's crime was of a sexual nature.

But, "when asked what crime Clinton was alleged to have committed, heavy viewers talked about sex, not perjury," communications professor Michael Morgan said.

The conductors of this study, communications professors Justin Lewis, Morgan, and Sut Jhally discovered that 81 percent of respondents to the survey were aware of Gennifer Flowers' claims to have had an affair with Clinton (then the Governor of Arkansas), and 75 percent were able to identify Linda Tripp's role in the Monica Lewinsky affair.

However, only 13 percent knew that Clinton signed the Welfare Reform Bill, and only 26 percent had even a vague notion of where he stands on health–care reform, as mentioned in a press release.

The aim of the study was to point out that Americans who are heavy television viewers tend to receive not only an inordinate amount of information about scandals, but that the media tends to misinform them about where Clinton stands on legislation, the professors explained.

The study found that the media presents Clinton in a framework which indicates that he is much more liberal than he actually is.

Massachusetts Daily Collegian.

A motion was proposed to lengthen the Bursar's office and the Financial Services offices during the first week of classes. The motion grew out of a conflict students have between classes and the office's hours.

Senator Jean Cassanto (Southwest – at-large) felt the need for students to have longer hours for the week was worth the extra money in salary to the employees of the offices.

"You can't say they don't have it in their budget to pay people to stay an extra two or three hours," Cassanto said.

The motion passed unanimously.

SGA also announced a referendum question that will appear on the election ballot for Student Body President and Trustee.

In the Orchard Hill and Southwest residential areas, where an experimental 24-hour card access security plan is in place, students will be asked if they felt the plan has increased security of the dorms.

Students will also be asked if the 24-hour card access plan should be abandoned.

The motion states that "If the majority of students vote "YES" on this question it will compel Housing Service to unlock the front doors of all Residence Halls between 8 a.m. and 8 p.m. every Monday through Friday."

The administration claimed declaring an impasse and implementing the final offer they had proposed was necessary to allow the departments to recruit graduate students this semester. They said by implementing a stipend increase totaling 16 percent, UMass would be able to better compete with other institutions at recruiting graduates.

"In addition to stipends, the major issues about which we were not able to reach agreement were child care, assistantships to increase the diversity of the graduate student population, and health care," Pearson said in a press release after the administration declared the impasse.

The administration had offered and with a declaration of impasse intended to increase the funding for child care by $100,000 per year for the next three years, for a total of $300,000. Pearson said the University would immediately implement the allocation of these funds after the impasse was declared.

Pearson said the administration also offered to increase the funding to increase the diversity of graduate students at the University by a total of $300,000 to a total of $625,000.

Pearson said the administration would work towards trying to deal with the health care issues facing graduate students.

Ketabchi said he had to get a contract signed so GEO members could get the wage increases and benefits they have been working towards.

The administration is still claiming that the Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission has no jurisdiction over GEO, because GEO is not a certified union.

GEO also has petitioned the Board of Conciliation and Arbitration, pending the decisions of this and the Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission.

"This is only a temporary postponement of these benefits while we pursue this course of mediation," Pearson said. "We believe that it is indefensible for GEO to have acted in such a manner as to deprive graduate students of the stipend increases which we all acknowledge they deserve."

Pearson also said she hoped the situation would be resolved in the next few days, so the stipend increases could be implemented.

■ study

Studies support this theory by showing that when Clinton has adopted more conservative positions, people are not only unaware of this (between 13 percent and 31 percent get the answer right in these cases), but they tend to assume he has taken a liberal position.

This rationale could be due to, as the professors argue, the media's tendency to emphasize conflict rather than agreement. This, the professors argue, leads people to assume that Clinton has acted as a liberal in response to a conservative Congress; second, the Republican strategy of labeling Clinton a liberal appears to have stuck in people's minds.

Lewis said in a press release, "this success does not seem to have put people off Bill Clinton — his current approval rating suggesting that while the public may disapprove of his character, they like his policies. Even if, as it turns out, they don't know what those policies are."

Dem fund-raiser indicted

By Michael J. Sniffen
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Democratic fund-raiser Maria Hsia was indicted yesterday by a federal grand jury on charges of disguising illegal campaign contributions by a California Buddhist temple to President Clinton's re-election campaign, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, his son Patrick and other candidates between 1993 and 1996.

It was the second indictment brought by the Justice Department's campaign finance task force.

Attorney General Janet Reno, who has been under Republican fire for refusing to turn the case over to an independent counsel, called it "yet another step forward in the Justice Department's investigation of campaign finance abuses associated with the 1996 election."

The Hsi Lai Temple, located in the Los Angeles suburb of Hacienda Heights, Calif., and formally known as the International Buddhist Progress Society, was named as an unindicted co-conspirator.

A trio of nuns from the temple told a Senate committee last fall that the temple illegally reimbursed donors after an April 1996 fund-raiser there that Vice President Al Gore attended. The nuns testified that the temple later destroyed or altered records to avoid embarrassment.

Gore has said he did not know it was a fund-raising event, but a draft report by the Senate panel concludes it should have been obvious to him.

Ecological education

We live today in a culture unique from all others in human history. Most fundamentally, ours is the only one that has created, or even attempted to create, the illusion that human beings are separate from nature. In contrast, traditional peoples inhabited a world suffused with what we would now call ecological awareness. In our fast-paced, technological, and fragmented society, it is all too easy to loose sight of the deep connections we all have with the natural world.

What we need is real ecological education as an alternative to the issue-oriented focus of environmental educatio today.

Jason Davis

If we are taught at all to consider the link between supermarket and topsoil, or washing machine and rainfall, it is only with a sort of grudging moral obligation that we should be "good to the environment." Most traditional cultures, on the other hand, would likely consider absurd any concept of "the environment" which considers things only outside of the realm of everyday human experience. There is no greater teacher of this truth than experiencing it yourself by spending a week in the wilderness or a summer growing your own vegetables.

Popular culture clings to the belief that we will become happier, more efficient people as we alter our environment, our bodies and our minds to mesh with a human culture that has lost touch with the natural world. Of course, just the opposite has occurred. Even a casual observer can note the disturbing increase in violent movies, reliance on psychiatric drugs (legal and illegal), and general unease with the state of things that marks late 20th century America. Mysteriously, all this has happened as our economy has boomed and more and more people are able to achieve that elusive thing called the "American Dream."

However, the reasons are not so elusive. Human beings have evolved over hundreds of thousands of years in an environment and under a social system markedly different from our own frenetic, splintered society. Specifically, the phenomenon of human consciousness has developed over millennia in the context of a profound interaction with the natural world. Scientists have recognized an innate human need, often subconscious, to be deeply attuned to nature. Biologist Edward O. Wilson explores this theme in his book Biophilia. As he describes it, our genetic background implores us to engage the living world, human and non- human, in a creative and involved fashion. When this fails to happen, as is too often the case in modern society, the result is isolation, violence and environmental destruction.

How can we begin to address this profound problem? Our culture's false belief that we are somehow separate from nature is so deeply ingrained it is often invisible. Modern conveniences such as the supermarket and the flush toilet help make this possible, insulating us from the real and inseparable connection we have with the natural world. Obviously, I am not advocating a return to the outhouse, but rather a culture-wide questioning of the wall of illusions we have created and continue to create at a record pace. We need to ask ourselves: Where was this food Grown? Exactly what happens after I flush the toilet? Where was this oil pumped from? What kind of plants live in my backyard?

These may seem like childish questions, but they are what is needed to counteract the perceived isolation that we live in, the vast network of consumer messages we are bombarded with, and the shaky pseudoscience of the industry-led anti-environmental "movement."

Maybe these questions seem childish because they are childish, in that we should have asked them a long time ago. What we need is real ecological education as an alternative to the issue-oriented focus of environmental education today. Yes, it is extremely important to learn about global environmental problems we are facing and will be facing in coming years, but learning only about isolated environmental "issues" typically encourages students to focus on the symptoms of the crisis, rather than the root causes. Another common response is to throw one's hands up and think, "There problems are so huge and out of control that nothing I do will make any difference."

Instead of just using scare tactics alone, teachers can work towards creating a real understanding of the connections we have with our planet. We should instill in students the knowledge that these connections are something to be celebrated, rather than problems that inconvenience us. Furthermore, all students should have the opportunity to experience nature on a first-hand basis. Actually seeing ecology up close is the best way to make it into something real, rather than textbook abstraction. Always teachers should stress the continuity between the human world and the world "out there."

It is time to move beyond sounding the alarm. The future lies in changing the way we think about the planet we call home.

Mumia–fever hits UMass

I thought I had gotten away clean, but It followed me up here. I thought it had left it back in Philadelphia but it followed me up here.

Mumia–fever.

There are so many things I'd rather have follow me here from Philadelphia: the Flyers, The Daily News, The City Paper, South Street — the list goes on and on. I'd even rather have the ever–present smell of onions that pervades the city for some reason. But no, I got Mumia–fever following me around.

I cannot even think of siding with a cause that considers taking a cop's life "righteous," or can do it in such a flip manner.

Michael Messaros

Mumia Abu–Jamal was convicted of killing a police officer in the early '80s and was sentenced to death. For some reason, his case has become the cause celebré, attracting the attention of such luminaries as Ed Asner and author E.L. Doctorow. During my senior year of high school the issue was at a fever pitch. I was glad to leave for school and leave the protests and the news reports behind. I had my fill of the issue.

My feeling was that, for one, people seemed to be blindly following a cause, and two, the fact that a police officer had been killed, leaving behind a wife and child, seemed to be lost in the furor. All the sympathy was directed towards the accused, while none was shown for the victims.

But alas, three years into my tour of duty here, I am still bombarded with the issue. Saint Mumia and the cause seem to have taken a red eye up here. Amherst and Philadelphia seem to be the two places where Mumia–fever runs the highest, and, lucky me, the same two places where I split my time.

I kept calm on the issue. I hadn't talked about it for years now, and that was fine by me. But lately I've stumbled upon some flyers for a documentary on the "framing" of Mumia Abu–Jamal. I'd seen the flyer but never taken the time to read it, until about a week ago.

The first line of it offended me (and that takes a lot), as it described the killing of the police officer as "righteous." Have we really come this far, that a cause that fancies itself as noble could be so callous? Are these the people leading the charge?

I cannot even think of siding with a cause that considers taking a cop's life "righteous," or can do it in such a flip manner. Now, I know not everyone here at UMass would agree with the first line of the flyer, or at least I would hope so. I wouldn't worry about it, but there are two rather prominent groups attached to the flyer and I wonder if they support it's language.

I'm glad Ed Asner could pull himself away from guest- starring on "Ask Harriet" in order to lend his gruff–but– loveable voice to the cause. I don't know why he chose this one, or why anyone else feels so fiery about It. I guess we all have that shiny object that catches our eye. There seems to be so many others on death row whose guilt is questionable, but I guess they aren't as well spoken, or photogenic, or have had a book published.

I've actually softened on the subject over the years. No, really. It used to be that I had no doubt that Mumia was guilty. I admit to having my doubts now, but you won't see me wearing any "Free Mumia" patches anytime soon.

This is a picture of me riding the fence with gleeful abandon: Yee–ha! I believe that the facts are so sketchy in this case, It's hard for me to draw a thoughtful conclusion for the mess. But his guilt or innocence is not what I'm here to talk about. I wonder where so many people get their information, or what they see as "truth." Look at the issue before deciding. Don't just think it's a good cause because Rage Against the Machine wrote a song about it. Weigh whatever facts you can get out of it, but watch out, because both sides seem to have their own versions. You think he's not guilty? Fine. Great. Don't tell me about it. Set up a booth at Lollapalooza.

It all comes down to this: the more people shout in my face about the issue, the more people use propaganda to lend a tone of militancy to an issue, the more I back away and the more I resent the cause. Maybe It's time to break out a velvet glove.

I'm dying here

The question of my death came up this weekend.

While serving my valuable role as back–up shooting guard for the Bootsy Schwag All–Stars, I inflamed a case of bursitis in my left hip, and further x–rays reveal what a doctor told me was Aseptic Necrosis. My hip, they say, contains dead tissue.

Intramural wars are never easy.

The pain itself was very, very biting, and I spent Thursday and Friday night whining about my hip.

Stirring conversations. (There was even a smattering of "pottymouth," but decorum prevents me from repeating them here).

Housemate A thought this was all pretty funny. Besides sending a flurry of "pansy" bombs my way, he asked me if I was going to die. Then, Housemate C jumps in with his mouth (which, as we all know, is pretty big). Pretty soon, they're having a big old party at my expense. The following are excerpts from that fun little four–minute basting.

"Hey Luke, what would you leave me in your will?"

They both laughed. They're pretty funny.

You know why?

Because they're right. I have nothing.

This made me think about my assets. If I did, in fact, kick it, the following items would have to be taken care of.

Luke Meredith

1. Basketball media guides from the following schools: LaSalle, St. Bonaventure, Temple, Cincinnati, UConn and George Washington. Included in this subhead is a Christmas (sorry, Holiday) card sent to me by our friends at the A–10 Football Conference. It's one of my prized possessions.

2. Two alarm clocks— one of which works (if you shake it enough).

3. One Aiwa portable CD player, with Pearl Jam's Yield stuck inside. It's one of those "systems" that rich people are like "Yeah, we have one of those. It's great for the beach, or the pool."

I have no beach, and I have no pool.

4. One cassette tape of me on the radio during the famous UMass–William and Mary football war of 1996. Highlights include stretch where I scream, "The referees have to get control of the game. This is ridiculous."

Truly breakthrough broadcast journalism.

20 minutes before, I told all 11 listeners (this was, after all, WMUA) that a player had been "swallowed, like that new Bush song."

What can I say. I'm sorry.

5. A bookcase a drunken A and C swiped one Friday night and presented to me as "war booty," because I needed a bookcase. They were right. To this day, the origins of said bookcase are in dispute.

And you wonder why I love them.

6. 75–80 CD's, most of which could qualify for the inevitable "90s Grunge Classics" album that'll hit the stores in early 2004. Among the hidden treasures is Venaca Salt's first album, the Led Zeppelin box set (the crappy one from TV) and all three Stone Temple Pilots albums.

7. A near–mint edition "Booty Schwag All–Stars" t–shirt, with number 37 on the back. (You know, cause I'm Luke, there's a movie called Cool Hand Luke, Paul Newman is prisoner number 37, and he's Luke... it's a long story).

7. 60–70 copies of "Hoop Preview 97–98," that thing about the UMass basketball team. The plan was to mail them out to anyone I could think of and go, "Look, I was editor of this college. Give me a job!"

But they've sorta just sat there for awhile now.

If you count my two boxes of Kraft Mac and Cheese, four cans of ravioli, two boxes of Flavor–Ices and a Mama Rosie's frozen pizza, that's about the extent of my possessions. When you're a broke, 22–year–old (sad to say I'm that old) wanna–be journalist who writes for the Collegian, there really isn't much more to possess.

Oh sure, there's the U2 poster from Germany I've had since 11th grade, and the white baggy Nike shorts I wear to bed every night, but in the end, what is that, really? If I kicked it, right now, they'd probably throw all my stuff in the Mill Valley dumpster, and move some new punk in my room next year.

This, I think, is something to live for. At the very least, I'd like to leave something for my kids (who will probably be punks too) to fight over, like a "Fresh Prince" episode come to life.

I'm thinking a Booty Schwag All–Stars t–shirt ain't gonna cut it.

Administration switching stance on union status

To the editor:

The front page article of Tuesday's Collegian (2/10/98) repeats Sue Pearson's misleading statements about GEO's recognition as the bargaining agent for graduate employees. Both sides agreed at the bargaining table to voluntary recognition of the union. GEO then pressed for this to happen immediately, while bargaining continued, but the administration refused.

They followed this refusal with their current claim that GEO is not a recognized union and that they need not engage in mediation before declaring impasse.

Administration no more than union–busters

To the editor:

The Feb. 17 article in the Collegian on the GEO impasse contains a significant misunderstanding which must be immediately rectified. Susan Pearson's statement is untrue and misleads the campus community. She claims that GEO never completed a certification process. This statement implies GEO either did not wish to complete this process or was negligent in not doing so.

Nothing could be further from the truth. The issue of certification brought up by Susan Pearson is a union busting tactic. As a member of GEO's bargaining committee, I want to point out both parties agreed certification was not necessary because GEO was voluntarily recognized by the UMass administration. Both GEO and the administration agreed at the bargaining table that mere formalities remained. Since Jan. 30, GEO has pushed to have these formalities resolved, however the administration refused to allow GEO to do so.

The administration's refusal to allow GEO to complete the mere formalities of voluntary recognition coupled with the administration's illegal declaration of impasse in bargaining last week, make it apparent that the administration had impasse in mind as it refused GEO's wish to formalize the voluntary recognition. This refusal to allow GFO to formalize their recognition is now being used as a weapon to cripple GEO's status as a union. Furthermore, this refusal and the impasse demontrrate a clear attempt on the part of the UMass administration to bust unions campus wide.

MAI Treaty bad idea

To the editor:

The International Monetary Fund's recent admission that it erred during the Indonesian and Korean bailout raises the issue of whether centralized financial institutions do in fact know what is best for national economies, particularly those of developing countries.

In this connection we call attention to the Multilateral Agreement on Investment (MAI), a treaty being negotiated by the 29 wealthy countries of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) — including the United States and Canada — with little scrutiny by citizens or the media. After it is ratified, OECD policy briefs envision there will be mounting pressure on developing countries to accede to the MAI in order to compete for foreign investment.

A country which accedes to the MAI must open all sectors of the economy to foreign investors without placing any conditions in its long-term interest, such as transfer of key technology or the use of local suppliers or expertise. Foreign investors could take capital as well as profit freely in and out of the country, and be treated as equals with domestic investors in all respects, despite obvious inequalities in capital and resources. This will worsen the already weak balance of payments position of many countries. In return for these rights, foreign investors have no responsibilities; they can shop all over the developing world for the cheapest labor and lowest environmental standards.

Most alarmingly, investors could sue governments in special international tribunals which have binding jurisdictions, if they feel the treaty was violated. This is a direct assault on the democratic right of citizens of a country to determine their own economic policies, in their own best interests, through their elected governments. It takes powers away from representatives elected by, and accountable to, the citizens of nations, and hands them over to completely unaccountable entities — transnational corporations and the bureaucracy of international tribunals

The MAI is scheduled to be signed in May, 1998. In a few years time, will we again be reading news stories of how panaceas developed by insulated Western economists proved to be disastrous for the economy, labor, and environment of the developing countries?

win, but who really will win which she wrote for LeAnn Rimes.

BEST NEW ARTIST:
Fiona Apple
Erykah Badu
Paula Cole
Puff Daddy (a.k.a Sean "Puffy" Combs)
Hanson

Should Win— Erykah Badu was one of only a small handful of genuine talents to emerge in '97 and her stunning voice is certainly one that we'll be hearing in the future.

Will Win— I've said it a million times but Puff Daddy's real talent is as a label exec and a producer, and it will be hard for the voters to ignore the stranglehold he's had on the R&B charts since last March.

BEST ALTERNATIVE MUSIC PERFORMANCE:
Homogenic — Bjork
Earthling — David Bowie
Dig Your Own Hole — The Chemical Brothers
The Fat Of The Land — Prodigy
OK Computer — Radiohead

Should Win— I'll be happy to see any one of these deserving albums win, but it would be especially sweet for voters to acknowledge the breakbeat techno found on The Chemical Brothers' Dig Your Own Hole.

Will Win— In what may be a pattern for the evening, look for the nominee (though wholly deserving) whose Earthling — as well as the

BEST RAP ALBUM:
No Way Out — Puff Daddy & The Family
Supa Dupa Fly — Missy "Misdemeanor" Elliott
Wyclef Jean Presents The Carnival — Wyclef Jean
Life After Death — The Notorious B.I.G.
Wu–Tang Forever — Wu–Tang Clan

Should Win— Easily the most competitive category, Elliott's innovative production techniques and tripped out beats give her a slight edge over Biggie and Wu–Tang for top rap honors.

Will Win— The only guarantee here is that Puffy and his Bad Boy subsidiary duo will manage the pathetic to push our Five awkward picks for Grammy shows to go accept performances in his honor. Bonus points if Mary J. Blige and Lil' Kim are involved.

Vibraphonist to play ASG

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

As part of the celebration of Black History Month, the Augusta Savage Gallery will host jazz vibraphonist Jay Hoggard who will be presenting a solo performance tonight at 7 p.m.

Through his numerous recordings and performances, Hoggard has proven himself to be one of the top creative artists of contemporary music. He is also considered to be the preeminent vibraphonist of his generation. An innovative and gifted composer and performer, Hoggard has released more than a dozen albums of consistently high quality. The albums range in content from classic jazz to original groundbreaking works.

Born in Washington, D.C., Hoggard grew up in Mt. Vernon, N.Y. in a religious family. Hoggard's father, I. Clinton Hoggard, is a retired bishop in the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church. His late mother, Eva, also devoted much of her life to the church.

As a child, Hoggard was exposed to a diverse musical background. His mother gave him piano lessons, while he studied the saxophone in school. Hoggard attributes a major influence on his thinking to an experience at the age of 13 while attending Duke Ellington's Second Sacred Concert at his church in Harlem. Hoggard recalls the pivotal moment in his life, "during the break, my father took me back to meet Ellington. He said, 'Duke I want you to meet my son.' I remember looking up at him as he seemed to be none feet tall. I decided soon after that I wanted to play music."

At the age of 16, Hoggard took up the vibraphone. "One night I had a dream that I was playing the vibes. I asked my father to rent me a set and from the first moment, I knew that this was what I was supposed to do."

Hoggard graduated from the renowned World Music program of Wesleyan University in Connecticut. At Wesleyan, Hoggard studied with Clifford Thornton and began playing professionally. He performed at Carnegie Hall and toured Europe with Thornton while he was still a freshman. After many international tours and upon graduation, Hoggard returned to New York City where he was soon proclaimed "the most dazzling new vibraphonist in jazz."

According to the press release, Hoggard is quite taken with the history of the vibraphone, from its origins in tuned rocks found 4,000 or 5,000 years ago in Cambodia, to the wooden African marimba and its metallic predecessors in Indonesian gamelan. He explains his relationship with the instrument, "What I love about it is that there is something almost mystical about the vibes and these instruments. The people who played them are part of an oral tradition. I consider myself part of a very significant musical tradition. The roots of the instrument go back to the African culture."

Jay Hoggard gives a vibraphone demonstration tonight at the August Savage Gallery.

This performance is free and open to the public. Augusta Savage Gallery is located in New Africa house in the Central residential area near the University Health Services. The gallery is a program of the Fine Arts Center and the W.E.B. DuBois Afro-American Studies Dept.

Concert grabs Mardi Gras spirit

GENO DELAFOOSE & THE FRENCH ROCKIN' BOOGIE
Iron Horse Music Hall
Feb. 17

NORTHAMPTON — Apparently the new trend in Northampton is a type of music rooted in New Orleans known as zydeco. With its third zydeco act in as many weeks, the Iron Horse presented Geno Delafoose and his backing band, The French Rockin' Boogie.

In the spirit of New Orleans during Mardi Gras, the club was covered with beads. Although the venue was a little bit small, the crowd had no trouble enjoying themselves as they danced the night away. As soon as Geno started up his squeeze box, the crowd got right into the music, and stayed that way all the way through both sets and an encore.

The band was made up of Geno on the squeeze box, a wash board player, a bassist, a left-handed guitarist and a drummer. The sound can only be described as dance music that makes you feel good. The set consisted of mostly upbeat songs, but a few slower loves songs were played to let the crowd, which consisted of mostly cou-

When the decision of what we would like to see children watch on television comes to mind, we generally think of programs that will expand their minds and open them to new experiences that help them grow. Obviously, most children would much rather be watching the "Power Rangers" than listening to a large purple dinosaur sing nursery rhymes for 60 minutes. Parents often wonder how far they should let their children venture from the educational programs to the shows more directed towards a child's interest. This past week, the United States was told that its children would be introduced to a brand new type of parent's nightmare.

In the fall, "Pokeman," an extremely popular Japanese cartoon will be introduced to the afternoon cartoon line-up in several American cities. "Pokeman" has created much controversy in Japan, after it aired an episode containing scenes of flashing lights and colors that caused over 700 children to experience convulsions, seizures and blackouts. After the incident was reported to a national news show in Japan, the news re-aired the scene causing an approximate 200 more children to experience the shock once again. Parents in the U.S. are strongly concerned about the effects that this show will have on their children once the show arrives on American soil. A spokesman for the company responsible for bringing "Pokeman" to the U.S. assures viewers that there is nothing worry about, and the show is being designed so that children will not experience the same reactions as before.

Now, some news about the future of one of primetime's most guilty pleasures... the sleazy and catty "Melrose Place." The rumor floating around is that this may be the show's last season unless Heather Locklear signs on for another year (her contract is set to expire after this season). I mean, let's face it, what would "MP" be like without the Queen Bee herself. The rumors stem from the fact that the show's ratings continue to decline into the depths of UPN-dom.

I have to admit (big surprise here) that I used to watch the show religiously about two or three years ago but have since lost any remaining interest in it. Watching the two-hour special last week did little to rekindle it either. Sure, some of the cheap thrills are still there but it's not the spectacle it used be. There's only so much the hilarious Lisa Rinna — by far one of the best characters on the show — can do. In all fairness though, not all of its former flair has been lost (as is the case with most of the old-school cast). The show has its moments and Amanda still has some of the bitchiest one liners in the biz. Perhaps there's hope yet though. Remember when Kimberly blew up the apartment building?

On to television's most gorgeous, if not troubled families... "Party of Five" was its usual satisfying yet depressing self last week. As if things weren't bad enough with Charlie dying of cancer and all, the state threatened to take Claudia and Owen away from him. Don't fret, however, the matter was resolved and the kids are back at home. I'm telling you though, Kirstin's husband's patience is wearing awfully thin. I'd give that relationship two weeks, tops.

I have a slight problem with Wednesday line-up, though because I'm always an emotional wreck (slight exaggeration) after 11 p.m. at night. The problem is this. At nine, I watch the oh-so depressing "Party" and then, at 10 p.m. I watch one of the most hysterical hours of television, "South Park" (yes, I'm one of "those" people).

The whole experience, between bawling my eyes out and laughing my ass off, sends me into an emotional tailspin, so much so that I often just refuse to watch "SP" altogether. I'm not in the mood, so of course I end up missing one of the most crude yet hysterical comments in the show's history, something involving a carpet I believe.

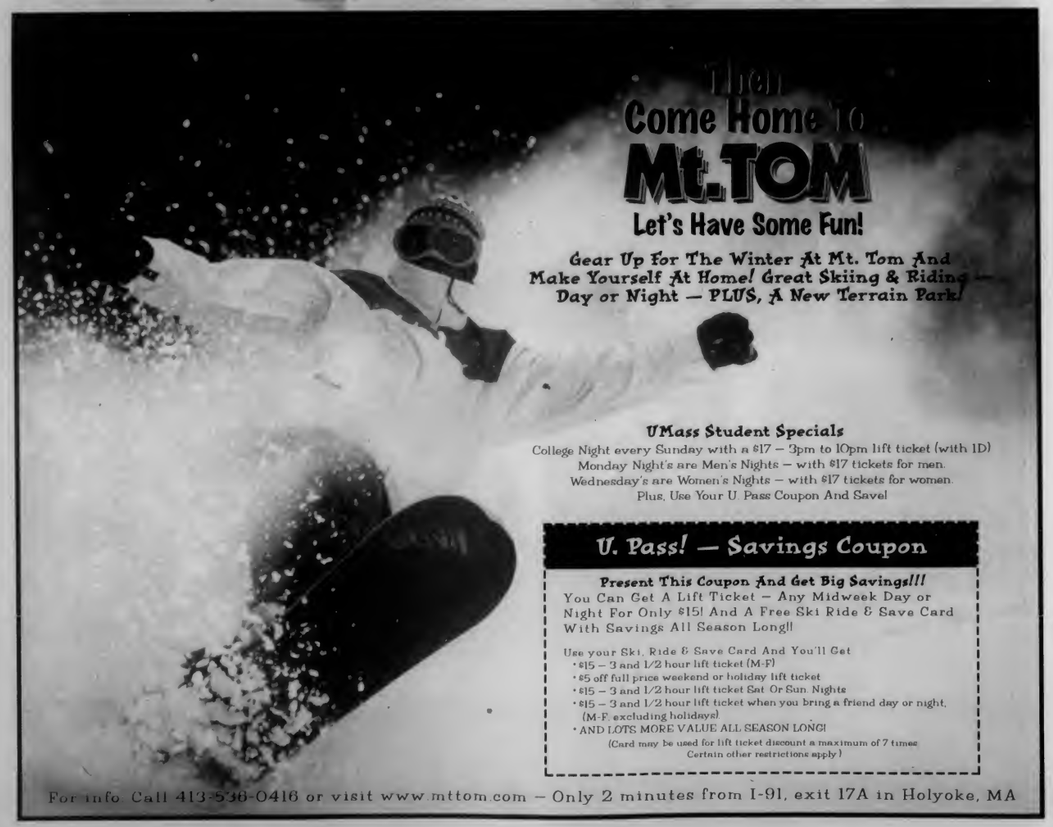
While we're on the subject of witty television shows, may I suggest giving "Ally McBeal" a try (airs on Monday after "MP" on Fox). The show is a riot, especially this past Monday's episode when the ladies were discussing the virtue of "size" and whether or not it really matters (not to be eclipsed by the baby sequence at the end of the show). Picture a mixture of "Moonlighting" and "Seinfeld" (back when it was funny) and that's what you get. It really is a great light-hearted, fun show.

Another show I'd highly recommend is ABC's "The Practice" (Mondays at 10 p.m.), starring television's new heartthrob, Dylan McDermott and the brilliant Lara Flyn Boyle, the star of one of the all time great flicks, Threesome). Lara has got to be the casting coup of the year. I only started watching the show a few weeks ago but already, I'm hooked. Think "L.A. Law" with a hint of spice and a bit more action. Right now, Lara's character and Dylan's character are embroiled in a courtroom battle which could be construed as a slight conflict of interest considering the fact that the two of them are romantically involved. Now it's time for him to choose between the woman he loves and the court case. It's the stuff that drama is made of.

The "Bad Taste Prom of the Week" goes hands down to the Eye network with their not-funny ads promoting Tom Selleck's new show, "The Closer." If you caught any of these fillers over the past week, you'll notice some really cute dogs, while Mr. Voice-Over Man taunted viewers with "If you don't watch, we'll have to send the dogs back... and you know what that means."

One last thing before I leave, what's up with all these somber episodes of some of our favorite ABC comedies. It seems like every week there's a new tragedy on "Home Improvement," etc. Now, "Soul Man" is airing a tragic episode (unfortunately the show is so awful, every week seems like a tragedy). Aren't there enough dramas out there already. Let's just lighten these comedies up a bit, okay!

A few quick notes...



• "Dawson's Creek" has taken the Nielsen ratings by storm and is posting the WB network's highest numbers ever. Watch and you'll find out why.

• Just to let you know, Oprah Winfrey's special, "The Wedding" (one of those sappy tear-jerkers) is airing sometime next week (I believe it's next Sunday at nine) so be sure to mark it on your calendars if you're in the mood for a sappy drama.

In other news, as the Olympics continue to dominate the television world, Titanic continues to climb up the charts of all-time grossing films in history. This past weekend, Fox aired a "behind-the-scenes" look at the way the movie was made. It gave people more of an idea what went into the making of the film and just how that movie was made.

Reed's latest shows quiet power

Pianist Eric Reed reaches new heights playing some old standards on his second release on Impulse, Pure Imagination.

Reed's theme is reworking of songs associated with Broadway, and he does just that, performing masterful versions of many classics which is no small feat.

A West Side Story's "Maria" is done in a way which makes the listener wish that Reed's version becomes the standard. Although he works many variations off Bernstein's main theme, the meaning of the song is held strong and made more urgent and ultimately more passionate. It's highlighted by an outstanding bass break and scatting, wispy drums.

Reed's take on "Send in the Clowns" shows his full range, evoking ease, surprise, anger, fear and jubilation all in one, making it easily the best track on the CD, while his virtuosity on "42nd Street" seems to boast "I'm the baddest" — the track really moves.

The CD also has its quieter moments with the gospel-influenced "You'll Never Walk Alone," the title track, "Pure Imagination" and "My Man's Gone Now/Gone, Gone, Gone," all displaying a quiet power present in Reed's repertoire.

Overall, this recording is outstanding. Reed is a prolific jazzman who knows how to work it.

March 24 marks the release of Serendipity (Impulse), the debut of tenor saxophonist, Gregory Tardy.

Jazz/Blues Weekly

BY JOE SULLIVAN

Tardy's previous experience includes membership in drummer Elvin Jones' Jazz Machine and some time alongside Wynton Marsalis, but this CD fails to meet their standards. "Serendipity" is defined as "the faculty of making valuable discoveries by accident," and the recording lives up to the part about accident.

The first track, "Forgiveness," has Tardy playing in many different styles, from raspy to smooth, staccato to slurred, loud to soft, and it makes it difficult to know how to feel about it or what is attempting to be expressed. This sets the tone for the rest of the album.

"Blues to Professor Pickens" exemplifies a disruptively unpleasant rhythm section which is found on many of the up tempo concoctions, while "Prisoner of Love" is evidence of an over-produced commercialized elevator jazz (similar to Kenny G) present on this CD.

The only real highlight is the final song, "Ask Me Now," which features Tardy playing solo and in duet with his bass player. Playing stripped down may be a style he should stick with in the future.

Jazz Underground — Live at Smalls (Impulse) was recorded over a three day-period last July at Smalls jazz club in New York City, and is made up of some stunning pieces performed in the big band tradition.

The two main highlights of this recording are

Hope you all enjoyed last week's Valentine's Day recipes and that they helped make for a sweet night (by the way, if you liked the recipe for the swordfish, try the same preparation with steak, chicken breast, scallops, shrimp or even tofu).

I created this week's recipe to highlight the flavors of Southeast Asia. It reflects the people of that region's love and extensive use of rice, shellfish, citrus and coconuts.

"Hexophony," by the Jason Lindner Big Band, and "I've Never Been in Love Before," by the Omer Vital Group. The former is a wild Latin-influenced jam featuring a crazy rhythm section, occasional flute effects, and an all-around soaring horn section, while the latter contains a throaty tenor sax and a sassy call and response duel between the horns and the bass.

With a hopeful saxophone that relies on a trilling technique at the start, a little bit of movement in the middle, and a flourish at the end, Zaid Nasser's "Everything Happens to Me" is also worth hearing. Though it is probably the most thoughtful track on the CD, it is also the most soulful.

The final two tracks culminate the live recording well as the Charlie Owens Quartet's "Losing Victory" is mellow but downright sly, while "Phat" (Jason Lindner again) grooves on a big sound reminiscent of big band glory days in the '30s and '40s.

Pan-Asian Paella

Ingredients:
1 tbs. — butter
1/2 — cup water
3 tbs. — olive oil
1 bu. —scallions, white part finely chopped, green tops sliced thin on the bias and reserved
5 ea. — shallots, finely chopped (or 1 med. onion)
2 tbs. — ginger root, finely chopped
1 tbs. — garlic, finely chopped
2 ea. — lemongrass stalks, bottom 1/2 of inner core, finely chopped
1 tbs. — hot green chili peppers, finely chopped
1 bu. — cilantro, stems and roots washed and finely chopped, leaves reserved
2 ea. — limes, zest grated and juice reserved
2 cups — short grained sushi style or arborio (risotto type) rice
1 can — coconut milk (non-sweetened)
1 can — chicken broth
4 tsp. — fish sauce (nam pla) or 2 tsp. Worcestershire sauce
1 tbs. — rice (or white) wine vinegar
1/2 lb. — large shrimp, peeled and deveined, shells reserved
12 ea. — cherrystone or littleneck clams, washed well
12 ea. — mussels, washed well
(salt and pepper to taste)

Procedure

1) In a small saucepan over med.-high heat, melt butter and add reserved shrimp shells. Sauté until pink and toasted (about 5 min.) and then add water. Bring to a boil and simmer for 10 minutes. Strain liquid through a sieve and reserve for later.

2) Place a large pot over medium high heat and allow it to get hot (4-5 min.). Add oil, the whites of the scallions, the shallots (or onion), the ginger, garlic, lemongrass, cilantro stems and roots, chilies and the grated lime zest. Now is the first time to season the dish by adding salt and pepper (about 2 tsp. of salt and of freshly ground black pepper). Sauté until soft (about 4-5 min.).

3) Add rice and sauté for another 2 minutes until rice and veggies are well combined.

4) Next, add coconut milk, chicken broth, fish sauce (or the Worcestershire), vinegar, reserved lime juice and reserved shrimp-shell broth. Mix well and bring to a simmer. Reduce heat to low and cover. Cook for exactly 10 minutes.

5) After 10 minutes, the rice should have absorbed a lot of the liquid. Now add the clams and mussels directly on top of the rice mixture and cover again. Cook for six more minutes.

6) After six minutes, the clams and mussels should be just beginning to open. Now add the shrimp and give the whole thing a good stir to incorporate (making sure that nothing is sticking to the bottom of the pan and that the shrimp are completely covered by the rice). Cover again and cook for four more minutes.

7) When cooking is complete, give a taste and adjust the seasonings. Transfer the contents to a serving bowl and garnish with the green parts of the scallions and the cilantro leaves.

Serving suggestion: For an added touch, sprinkle with chopped roasted peanuts and serve with lime wedges and some chili powder on the side or anoint with Asian hot oil for an extra blast of flavor. Good Eating!

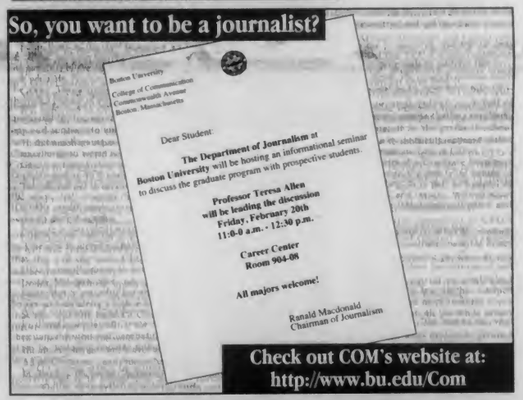
ples, get in a slow dance or two.



Although the entire band was talented and very professional with their stage presence, Geno was definitely the highlight of the show. His voice is so sweet and mellow, singing lyrics in both English and French, that the thought of maple syrup comes to mind. Combined with the high energy level of the band and the crowd, this made for one incredibly entertaining show.

The band played almost every song from That's What I'm Talking About, as well as many other songs that have not yet been released on an album. The band showed their versatility by playing a very emotional blues tune called "I'm a Lonely Man," which included a guitar solo that would make any blues man proud.

Once the band finished their second set, the crowd would not let them leave. After hysteric applause, the band returned to give the crowd what they needed to be sent home. A little more zydeco. Geno wished everyone a safe ride home and a blessing. After more than two and half hours of rocking dance music, the band called it a night.

Dominik Hasek unbeatable against U.S. hockey team

By Mike Nadel
Associated Press

NAGANO, Japan — The Dominator's scrambling, splay-legged style claimed its biggest victim yet: the best U.S. Olympic hockey team ever assembled.

The Americans scored first but never again on Czech Republic goaltender Dominik Hasek. They finished the game with their heads bowed in shame, having failed to take the gold medal they expected from the first NHL-infused "dream team" Olympic tournament.

"Sometimes in our sport, one individual can make a huge difference. We saw that today. Our big guns couldn't find a way to score," U.S. coach Ron Wilson said after his team was eliminated with a 4-1 quarterfinal loss to the Czechs early yesterday.

"We came here with expectations of gold. It's something that will always be in the back of your mind: What if," he said. "We feel we let a lot of people down, but more than any we let ourselves down."

Captain Chris Chellos said the Americans set themselves up for failure in the single-elimination quarterfinals by not doing better in the round-robin phase to earn a higher seed and avoid "the best goaltender in the world."

"If we had finished higher and peppered Finland with 39 shots," he said, "I don't think we would have lost."

But 39 shots are just another lazy-day afternoon for Hasek, MVP of the NHL last season and three times voted the league's best goalie.

"I've never seen a better goalie," Czech captain Vladimir Ruzicka said. "Some of the saves he made were unbelievable. His legs were going over here, his hands were going over there. We know we only have to score one or two goals."

The Hasek factor is huge in these Olympics, because he can almost win the gold medal by himself. He has allowed only five goals in four games in carrying the Czechs (3-1) to a Friday semifinal date with the winner of the Canada-Kazakstan quarterfinal.

In yesterday's other games, Russia defeated Belarus 4-1 and Sweden fell to Finland.

"We beat one of the greatest teams in the world. I'm very happy," Hasek said.

Of the Americans, the Buffalo Sabres star added: "They didn't play badly. They just didn't score [enough]. When you score only one goal, you can't win."

Some U.S. players disagreed with Hasek's assessment. They didn't play very well, especially defensively, and the entire experience left them feeling badly.

"It was the biggest waste of time. Ever," alternate captain Keith Tkachuk said. "We deserve to be out of it. We didn't play well from the start.

"This is awful, it's devastating. From the opening shot, we weren't well enough to do anything. We were just a big disappointment."

Six 50-goal scorers and 17 other NHL stars weren't enough to keep the United States from extending its medal-less run to five Olympics. The U.S. team hasn't won so much as a bronze since the 1980 Miracle on Ice gang captured gold.

The Americans finished 1-3 and were outscored 12-4 by the only three good teams they faced.

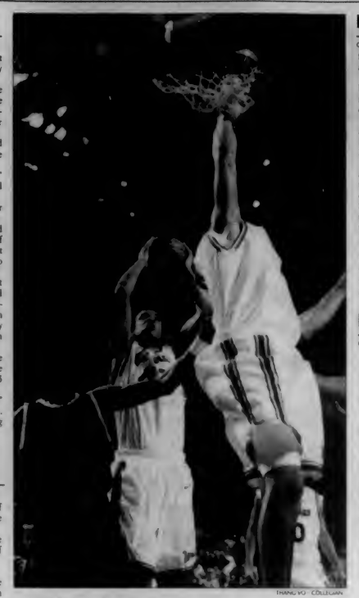
(Wheeler and Mobley) are the best 1-2 punch in the A-10," Mobley said.

"We came out with the attitude that we're the best guards in the country," said Wheeler, who finished with 17 points and four assists. "We didn't let down."

With the victory, the Rams ended a 10-game slide against the Minutemen.

"It's been a long, long time," Wheeler said. "We really wanted this one."



"It couldn't have come at a better time for us," Harrick said.

With the win, Rhode Island moves to within a game of Massachusetts in the A-10 East Division heading into the final two weeks of conference play.

UMass was plagued by a soft defensive effort — Rhode Island shot 51 percent in the first half — and an inconsistent showing on offense. The Minutemen shot only 34 percent and committed seven turnovers.

But the Achilles heel for the Minutemen was the foul line, where they converted on only 22-of-33 attempts.

"We did not hit our free throws," Flint said. "That was the game. They hit theirs and had two big rebounds off of them."

Jim Harrick said. "That was one of the one or two greatest efforts [I've seen] in my coaching career."

But if anything, last night's game epitomized the main ingredient of college basketball.

Fun.

Just ask Clarke, who had a smile on his face for each free throw in overtime, with the game hanging tenderly in the balance. Just ask Flint, who had nothing but good things to say about the UMass fans, many of whom have been wishy-washy all season.

Ask Monty Mack, the sophomore who could do nothing but smile before the tip-off of the first overtime, moments after taking two very questionable three-pointers and missed.

It was college hoop at its best, and it was fun. It was the marathon nobody wanted to leave.

And if Kerner had hit that shot? Who knows. We might still be there.

for the conference Rookie of the Year award, which Gomez won last year.

Aguilar is also among the nation's best in free throw shooting. She currently ranks 13th with her 87.3 percentage.

McKeown is the 16th winningest active coach in women's basketball. He recorded his 200th win at GW on Feb. 9, with a win over Temple.

The Minutewomen are currently on a five-game win streak. They earned their fifth win with a 55-46 victory over St. Joseph's in Philadelphia last Saturday, in their first ever win over the Hawks in Philly. They now trail the Hawks by one game in the A-10 East standings.

Tonight's game is the last one the Minutewomen will play at home. They will conclude their regular season with an away game at St. Bonaventure Saturday.

Also looking to contribute this weekend will be junior Brian Wisniewski, who placed second in the 100 backstroke, third in the 200 back and fourth in the 200 individual medley in the last championship.

Looking to fill in for the graduated Mike Shaw will be junior Geoff Gear. In the meet, Shaw finished fourth in the 200 butterfly.

None may be able to make much bolder a statement in this year's meet, however, than senior Sean Anderson and freshman Billy Brown. Both swimmers went undefeated in their respective events during dual meets. Anderson in the 50 free and Brown in the 100 breaststroke.

Anderson's time is the best in the conference at 20.84 while Brown's 57.58 ranks him second on the all-time UMass list in his event.

only run of the game with a solo homer from sophomore Nicole Faessler in the bottom of the fourth.

In their loss to UNLV, the Minutewomen fell behind 3-0 in the first when Julie Crandall hit a three-run homer off junior pitcher Danielle Henderson. In the fifth inning Buckley hit a double to left center and then scored on a ground out from Osier.

In the sixth, Buckley again hit a double — this time to right center, bringing in freshman Debbie Tomaguchi. Henderson struck out eight for UMass.

Galas had a pair of hits and two RBI for the Minutewomen in their only win of the tournament against Long Beach State. Galas later hit an RBI single to bring George in for UMass' first score of the game.

George scored the first of three UMass runs in the fifth inning off a 49er throwing error. Buckley brought in Galas with a single down the right field line, and Cutridge scored off a bloop single to center from Faessler.

The Minutewomen upped their score to 5-0 in the sixth when Katie Kenderski scored on a triple from Galas. Jeffries held off a rally in the seventh with a no hitter and earned her first career win. Henderson also earned a save in the contest.

Horoscopes

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — A little strategy goes a long way today, as most people are just winging it and doing things in a random manner. You can beat them all!

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You may find yourself missing something or someone who once held a special fascination for you and actually meant a great deal.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Any complications should not be considered trivial today; every time you encounter a snag, you must take it as seriously as you can.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Take care you don't wind up lamenting some lost chance that you gave up, in favor of something that couldn't last. Go for the real thing.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Someone may be trying to keep you from doing everything you've planned today, but you won't know why until you've put an end to the threat.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You can learn quickly today and put yourself in a more beneficial position as a result, whether in a business deal or a recreational activity.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You may feel as though you are under someone's spell today. In fact, you are acting in a manner that may be, for a time, inexplicable.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You are in the mood to have it all— or give it up entirely. A little this or that is no good for you at this time. Rethink your priorities.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Someone in authority thinks that you are more able to oblige in some way that is possible, and you must waste no time in making this clear.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Take care that you're not so busy taking in the big picture that you let one or two of the key details work against you in some way.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You will feel more secure than usual today, and it may be that your own attitude about wheat is important is somehow on the mend.

AQUARIUS (Jan 20.–Feb. 18) — Something big is just around the corner, and you're going to want to be ready for it. You can't afford not to reap all the benefits.

Quote of the Day

"I don't like quoting authority to support an argument."

Rhode Island pulls out A-10 thriller, 87–85

FHANG YU / COLLEGIAN

Mike Babul jams home two points in UMass' 87–85 double overtime loss to Rhode Island last night at the Mullins Center.

By Corey Peter Goodman
Collegian Staff

March Madness came two weeks early for the Massachusetts men's basketball team and the Rhode Island Rams last night.

The two teams fought for 40 minutes of regulation and for two overtime sessions — the first in William D. Mullins Center history — before the Rams escaped with an 87–85 victory in front of a deafening sell-out crowd of 9,495 at the Mullins Center.

Rhode Island	87

UMass, which falls to 19–7, 11–2 Atlantic 10, erased a six- point deficit with 1:08 remaining in the first overtime. Junior Charlton Clarke, who finished with 24 points, knocked down an open three-pointer and then was fouled shooting another with 6.3 seconds left. Clarke calmly knocked down all three to send the game into the second overtime.

Rhode Island (19–6, 10–3) took over from there. Senior guard Tyson Wheeler beat Monty Mack for a lay-in and hit a pair of free throws to give the Rams an 86–82 edge with 20 seconds remaining.

Clarke then hit a trey from well beyond the arc — his fourth of the game — to pull UMass to within a point. Ram guard Cuttino Mobley, the game's high scorer with 26 points, hit a free throw to put Rhode Island up by two.

With 1.9 seconds left, Chris Kirkland hit Lari Ketner on a full-court pass, but Ketner's turnaround from 18-feet fell just short.

"The fans sure got their money's worth," Rhode Island coach Jim Harrick said. "This was one of the greatest efforts ever."

"It was a must-win game for them, and they came in and played that way," Massachusetts coach Bruiser Flint said.

Mobley's three with 16:57 remaining in regulation gave the Rams their biggest lead of the game at 13. But the Minutemen, behind 18 points from Ketner and 16 from Mack, clawed their way back into the ball game with a 7-0 run.

Chris Kirkland hit a short jumper then converted on a three-point play to cut the deficit to eight, 46–38, before Clarke connected on a long jump shot.

Preston Murphy extended the Rams lead to 11 with a pair of free throws and a lay-in with 11:10 to play.

Mobley converted on two foul shots with 52 seconds left to give the Rams a six-point edge, 67–61. Following a Ketner put-back, Mack answered with an off-balance one-hander in the lane to pull UMass to within a basket, 67–65.

With 10 seconds left, Antonio Reynolds-Dean (20 points, 11 rebounds) hit only one free throw and UMass — without a timeout — was forced to take the ball the length of the court. Jonathan DePina found Clarke, who knocked down a three from the right wing that sent the game into its first overtime.

"When the team came to me, I tried to take it to another level," Clarke said. "The student body was great behind me, and coach really got me going."

The Ram guard trio of Mobley, Murphy and Wheeler avenged a 17-point loss at the hands of the Minutemen on Jan. 29. The three combined for 54 points.

"We just wanted to show that we showed. We wanted to show that we're the best 1-2 punch in the A-10."

The funny thing was, the Rams did the best they could to avoid such a finish. They played a better game than UMass did in the first 40 minutes, and led by as many as 13 points in the second half. They hit big shots, they made key rebounds, they played hard, they played smart.

But UMass just refused to die.

The Minutemen chipped at the lead, cutting it to six with three minutes to go, four with two minutes to go, three with nine seconds to go. And then Clarke, with 9,493 pairs of eyes resting squarely on him, coolly buried a three to send it into overtime.

Five minutes later, Clarke got fouled from behind the arc, and once again UMass needed three points. Clarke delivered, this time even cooler. None of his free throws even hit the rim. Just straight in.

But Rhody regrouped, hit a few shots and survived the thriller of the year. The Rams had the win they needed, the win that will probably seal a return trip to the NCAA tournament, and after 10 tries, they finally broke the UMass jinx.

"The fans sure got their money's worth," URI coach

THANG YU / COLLEGIAN

Lari Ketner dropped in 18 points and pulled down 11 rebounds, but it wasn't enough as the Minutemen fell to Rhode Island for the first time in 10 meetings.

Game epitomizes college hoop ideal: fun

Forget for a minute that the No. 18 Massachusetts men's basketball team lost to Rhode Island, 87–85, for the first time in five years. Forget the ill-advised, 25-foot three-point attempts by Monty Mack, the sluggish first half or the 34 percent shooting.

Forget how much you hate Jim Harrick, or how close Lari Ketner's shot at the buzzer in double overtime came to sinking through the net.

Why?

You'd be missing the point.

What you need to do is remember Charlton Clarke's three with 1.6 seconds left, the shot that sent the Mullins Center into a frenzy. Remember Clarke nailing three free throws with 6.3 left in the first overtime, giving the Minutemen once more chance at life. Remember the atmosphere, remember the fans, remember how close UMass (19–7, 11–2) came to pulling off the comeback of the year.

It's then that you realize last night's UMass–URI game will go down as the best game you've seen in a long time.

It was a marathon, in every sense of the word. Fifty minutes, 97 rebounds, 42 three-point attempts, 63 free throws, two overtimes and 9,493 people as loud as they've been all season.

But unlike a marathon, there was never, ever, a dull moment.

"This was a great game, a fantastic game," said Massachusetts coach Bruiser Flint, who likened the game to UMass' contest at Xavier in 1996, when the Minutemen beat the Musketeers in overtime to preserve their No. 1 ranking. "The fans were fantastic. You have to give Rhody credit. They needed this game and they took it."

Needed it badly. After losing at home to Temple, the Rams had dropped out of the Top 25. Senior guards Tyson Wheeler and Cuttino Mobley, the heart and soul of a scrappy Rhody bunch, would have gone through their entire careers without beating UMass.

That's a lot to carry on your shoulders.

Wheeler called it, quite simply, the biggest win of his career. Mobley likened it to a test for the duo, a test they passed.

"I can't remember a more exciting game," Mobley said. "It was like getting a monkey off our backs. We just wanted to come here and play hard... [because Wheeler] and I didn't play aggressive in the first meeting (won by UMass 74–57 in Providence), and it

Softball gets win, experience on road

By Jackie Leroux
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts softball team traveled to Arizona last weekend, and while it may have returned with a losing record, it made plenty of gains along the way.

The Minutewomen competed in the Coca-Cola Classic hosted by Arizona State in Phoenix. They played against four very tough teams — two of which are nationally ranked — and came back with a 1-3 record.

On Friday the Minutewomen lost games to Cal State Fullerton and No. 3 Washington, 3–7 and 1–2 respectively. On Saturday, they lost to UNLV, 2–4, and then beat No. 14 Long Beach State, 5–3. UMass was also scheduled to take on Alabama and No. 2 Fresno State, but both games were cancelled when the playing fields became too wet after rare late night rains that were generated by El Niño.

Despite the losses, the tournament did give the Minutewomen a welcome opportunity to get playing time outside, as they have spent most of their practices inside Boyden Gymnasium.

They also demonstrated that they have plenty of hitting power. They hit a .282 batting average as a team, whereas last year they only hit .167 in Arizona. Four players hit above .300, with senior co-captain Kim Gutridge leading the way at an even .500. Junior Becky Gorgie led the team with three runs scored, and had a .429 batting average. The UMass pitchers held opponents to a .198 batting average, where last year they allowed opponents to hit .305.

In the Cal State–Fullerton game, the Titans took an early 2–0 lead on a two-run home run off freshman Carrie Jeffries, who was making her collegiate debut. Junior Octavia Brown scored off an RBI single from George in the bottom of the second inning. George then came in off of an RBI single from junior Mandy Galas to tie the game.

Cal State scored four unearned runs in the top of the fifth. The Minutewomen would score for the last time in the top of the fifth when senior Kelly Buckley hit a sacrifice fly to bring in senior Tracey Osier. The Titans scored their final run in the sixth inning.

Against Washington the Minutewomen saw the Huskies take a 2–0 lead in the top of the third. UMass scored its

The Massachusetts women's basketball team is headed into one of its toughest contests of the season tonight. At 7:30 p.m., the Minutewomen (15–9, 9–5) will square off in the William D. Mullins Center with the Colonials of George Washington (17–7, 11–3).

ALEX KORCHARLAY / COLLEGIAN

Kara Trent and the UMass women's basketball team will need to apply strong offensive pressure in order to stop a tough George Washington

GW is currently tied with both Duquesne and Xavier for first place in the Atlantic 10 West. The team thrashed Duquesne in its last game on Sunday, 77–52.

The Colonials are perennial powerhouses. Coach Joe McKeown is looking to lead his team to its fifth consecutive regular season A-10 championship. The key to their successful record this season is being attributed to their "Spanish Connection." Sophomore guard Elisa Aguilar and junior forward Noelia Gomez, who both hail from Madrid, pack a 1–2 offensive punch for the Colonials.

Gomez, who is in only her second season with GW, is fourth in the Atlantic 10 with her 17.1 points per game, and Aguilar is close behind at fifth with 16.3. Gomez also leads the team in rebounding with six a game.

In addition, Gomez has posted four double-doubles this season, and she scored 29 points against Dayton on January 24. She was a preseason honorable mention All-American by Street & Smith's, and has been an A-10 Player of the Week once this season. Gomez will need to score just three points against UMass to reach the 1,000 career point mark. No Colonial has ever amassed 1,000 points in just two seasons.

Aguilar, has averaged 20 ppg in conference games. She also leads the team in assists with 5.1 per game. Aguilar has been named the A-10 Rookie of the Week four times this season, and is currently the favorite

Three–peat possible for men's swimming

By Jamie Jee
Collegian Staff

Momentum is usually an important factor throughout any type of a competitive season. Especially at the end, when the opposition gets tougher and the consequences become increasingly more important.

Fortunately for the Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team, the Minutemen have that momentum.

Going into the Atlantic 10 Championships, the Minutemen are coming off an impressive dual-meet season in which they compiled a picture perfect 10-0 record.

They finished it with a flurry, downing Fordham, 207–92, before preparing for their biggest test yet. That gave UMass its second undefeated dual-meet season in three years and seventh since the 1985–86 season.

The A-10 meet starts today and continues through Saturday, at Erie Community College in Buffalo, N.Y. The Minutemen will attempt to start things off quickly and see if they can manage to jump out to an insurmountable lead, a strategy that has worked well in the past.

Although the task will be much more difficult this weekend than in a regular dual meet, it may end up being what works and brings UMass its third consecutive A-10 title.

"We are looking pretty good," coach Russ Yarworth said. "We've been resting up and should swim well this weekend."

Among the teams that hope to take the Minutemen out of their gameplan early are rivals Rhode Island and La Salle, which field talented squads as well.

"Both Rhode Island and La Salle are teams we will have to watch out for," Yarworth said. "They've performed pretty well in the conference this year."

There will also be St. Bonaventure. The Bonnies finished second to the Minutemen last year, missing the winning 607 point total by 36.5 points.

Last year it was current senior Matt Davey who provided that early spark for the team as he won the 200 freestyle in a time of 1:39.77. Davey went on to take a silver in the 100 free, coming in at 45.90, and was a solid anchor leg for the 400 free relay team, which swam to a new school-record (3:03.88). Davey also added a fifth-place showing in the 50 free by swimming a 20.99.

N. Korea pursues talks with S. Korea

SEOUL, South Korea (AP) — In a remarkable peace overture, North Korea appealed directly to South Korean politicians yesterday, asking them to work toward reconciliation on the divided Korean peninsula.

The appeal was made in 70 letters to South Korean leaders — including the president-elect — delivered through the border village of Panmunjom.

The action was a marked policy shift for isolated North Korea, which declared Wednesday it was ready to talk with South Korea's newly elected government in the interest of ending decades of confrontation.

A top North Korean policymaker, Kim Yong Sun, said the letters "make clear that we are willing to have dialogue and negotiation with anyone in South Korea, including political parties and organizations."

"The North and the South must promote coexistence, co-prosperity, common interests, mutual collaboration and unity between fellow countrymen," Kim was quoted as saying by North Korea's official Korean Central News Agency.

Kim, regarded as a close confidant of leader Kim Jong Il, spelled out North Korea's new position during a meeting Wednesday of the country's major political parties and organizations, the news agency said.

Two arrested in Nevada subway plot

LAS VEGAS, Nev. (AP) — Two men have been arrested in Nevada and accused of plotting an attack, possibly on a U.S. city's subway system, the FBI said yesterday.

The suspects include a central Ohio man who was given probation after pleading guilty to illegally obtaining bubonic plague bacteria through the mail.

The two were taken into custody late Wednesday in a luxury car outside a doctor's office in Henderson, Nev., a Las Vegas suburb. The Clark County Detention Center in Las Vegas said 46-year-old Larry Wayne Harris and 47-year-old William Leavitt were in custody on charges of possessing "weapons for mass destruction." Jail officials didn't have hometowns for the men.

Last year, Harris, of Lancaster, Ohio, pleaded guilty to a count of fraud after he was accused of illegally obtaining bubonic plaguebacteria through the mail from a laboratory in 1995. He said he never intended to hurt anyone and was sentenced to 18 months' probation.

FBI spokesman Aurélio Flores would not confirm the suspects names.

"These individuals were involved in the contruction of a weapon," he said. "We have no idea where they were going to use it."

Torkildsen discusses his experiences in Congress

JOHN BURT / COLLEGIAN

Former Congressman and UMass alum Peter Torkildsen delivered a speech last night about his experiences in Congress.

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Former Congressman and University of Massachusetts Alumnus Peter Torkildsen said student voter turnout is contingent on having issues that students care about in a speech given last night.

Torkildsen said student voter turnout was low when he was a student at UMass except when it came to an issue the students cared about like abolishing Spring Concert.

"When I was running for Southwest assembly I knocked on doors and said 'Hi. I'm Peter Torkildsen. I'd appreciate your vote,' and turnout was still about 18 percent," Torkildsen said.

When they wanted to get rid of Spring Concert people really cared about that, Torkildsen said. "It's a matter of what is important to people. Sometimes it's the most basic things that people care about."

Torkildsen knows first hand the importance voter turnout can make.

"I lost that last election by 371 votes. If I had changed one vote in every precinct I would have been in my third term in Congress... If we had spent more money to increase voter turnout, again, I could have been re-elected," Torkildsen said.

Torkildsen also had praise for the education a student can receive at UMass. He called education "the great equalizer."

"You can get a first rate education here if you want one. You can get an education on par with any other institution," Torkildsen said.

He encouraged more UMass graduates to join him as members of congress and shouldn't be afraid to do that.

"I am proud to be the first [UMass alumus in congress]. I hope to be

Campus facilities in need of renovation

Five new buildings are projected to be built in the next five to seven years

By Victoria Groves
Collegian Staff

Facilities on campus in desperate need of repairs were the topic of yesterday's faculty senate meeting in a presentation given by James E. Cahill, Director of Facilities Planning Division.

"Over the past 10 years there have been many documented deterioration of buildings on American university campuses. We have some of these problems ourselves," Cahill said.

According to the Facilities Planning Division, the value of campus buildings total $1,640,000 with infrastructure adding another $400 million. The majority of campus buildings were constructed in the 1960s and 1970s.

Many of the buildings built from 1870 through 1930 still exist today on campus, totaling 46 out of all campus buildings.

The 1940s marked expansion of residential areas when most buildings constructed were two to four story buildings made out of brick as the University made the transition from Massachusetts State College to the University of Massachusetts.

Eventually, In the 1960s, there was a huge boom in on- campus construction; 43 percent of current buildings were built during this decade. Cahill credits this in part to the baby boomer generation and said that because these buildings were constructed so hastily, there was little attention paid to longevity or quality control.

"This was happening on every campus across the nation. The demand for education was skyrocketing. Buildings were getting higher, bigger and more complicated," Cahill said.

The 1970s represent the arrival of high rise buildings and the 1980s were responsible for minimal growth with the construction of only 16 buildings, 15 of which were trailers. Big projects like the William D. Mullins Center occurred in the 1990s.

Cahill outlined the anticipated construction that will take place in the year 2000 and beyond. Five new buildings are projected to be built in the next five to seven years.

"These facilities are either on the drawing board or being planned," Cahill said.

According to Paul Page, vice chancellor of administration and finance, the campus faces deferred maintenance costs estimated at $393 million. In addition, $15 million is required annually over the next 20 years to prevent adding to the deferred maintenance backlog.

"This is the first time the campus has undertaken such a comprehensive assessment of its physical facilities. It has been an extremely valuable exercise in many ways, not the least of which is that it has provided us with a detailed accounting of existing conditions and future needs," Page said.

"As a result, we're finally able to identify exactly what's facing us and what the campus must do to address its needs."

Mahar Auditorium was recently renovated, and Cahill cited Boyden Gymnasium, Goessmann Lab and Stockbridge Hall as possibly being next on the list for renovations.

Page outlined a number of long-term strategies for acquiring the funding necessary for facilities improvements including rolling over existing debt as it is retired, additional borrowing, increased campus funding, increased state funding and future capital campaigns.

"I can think of no greater challenge to our goal... than the maintenance, renovation and renewal of our physical facilities," Page said.

MassPIRG holds first infosession

By Frank Smith
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts Student Public Interest Research Group (MassPIRG) held its first general interest meeting of the semester Wednesday night to inform students of on-going and upcoming activities, and to encourage students to participate.

There are four main events MassPIRG is concentrating on; fighting hunger and homelessness, pesticide regulation, saving endangered species and planning an Earth Day celebration.

The meeting, which was held in the Student Union Ballroom, consisted of a brief introduction to the organization by sophomore BJ Cortis.

According to Cortis, UMass was the first school to have a chapter of MassPIRG, and the organization now has 27 chapters at various colleges and universities across the state.

"This is the mothership of a movement that spread all across the country," Cortis said.

MassPIRG members performed short skits to inform the attendees of what the organization is working on.

Ohio students protest U.S. attacking Iraq

By Barry Schweid
Associated Press

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — "A few dozen hecklers" will not deter the United States from its mission in Iraq — containing Saddam Hussein and reducing his ability to use biological and chemical weapons, Secretary of State Madeleine Albright said yesterday. President Clinton said Saddam should not be emboldened by the raucous debate. "Not if he understands the first thing about America," Clinton told reporters. "I believe strongly that most Americans support our policy. They support our resolve."

"Our goal... may not seem really decisive. But we're trying to contain Saddam Hussein. Whenever he puts his head up, we push him back. We are doing what must be done," Albright said on NBC's "Today" show.

A day after Clinton administration officials were heckled on a college campus in Ohio, former professor Albright returned to the classroom to make a case for threatening to bomb Iraq to drastically reduce its stores of dangerous weapons.

Albright was making back-to-back appearances at Tennessee State University here and at the University of South Carolina. She would be working smaller audiences than at the "town meeting" Wednesday at Ohio State University, where angry critics at times drowned her out, along with Defense Secretary William Cohen and Sandy Berger, Clinton's national security adviser.

"We know what we have to do," Albright said on NBC. Unless Saddam gives United Nations' inspectors unfettered and unlimited access to weapons sites, "We will be using force and the American people will be behind us," she said.

"If we have to use force, it is because we are America. We are the indispensable nation. We stand tall. We see further into the future," she said.

Albright said most Americans back administration policy and the officials will continue to explain the policy to the nation.

"A couple of dozen students disrupting it is something that takes away from the spirit of the project, which is to try to talk to the American people about the stakes and American foreign policy," she said on ABC's "Good Morning back... I am not proud to be the only one. Don't be afraid to run for congress. Make a difference by being a good citizen. Or help out a candidate. I've relied on volunteers to win elections in the past," Torkildsen said.

As further motivation for this Torkildsen spoke of the work he did as a congressman in the 104th Congress.

He voted to increase funds for Title 1. A program to help disadvantaged elementary school students catch up with their peers.

"Students that need it receive help to catch up to the other students. I'm glad under the 104th Congress funds for that increased," Torkildsen said.

The former congressman also spoke of being an individual and the work he has done to help students.

"I have prided myself on being an individual. The one thing I was proud of was that I was able to increase the Pell grant," Torkildsen said.

Torkildsen also said that Republicans in Congress forced President Clinton to come up with a balanced budget.

"When Republicans took control of Congress, Clinton submitted a budget that had deficits for [several] years. [Republicans said] Don't give us a budget unless it's balanced in reven years," Torkildsen said. "If we had not insisted in that we would not see the growth of today."

Showing his individuality as a politician, Torkildsen said he was against candidates receiving "PAC money" and backs that belief with action.

"I have refused PAC money. My opponent has taken $400,000 in PAC money. It's clearly a difference between the two of us. Where we are out-spent we will not be out- worked," Torkildsen said.

PAC money is Political Action Committee money. Several interest groups together donate $10,000 to a candidate.

Torkildsen is now campaigning to represent the sixth district of Massachusetts in the House of Representatives. The election is in November.

The speech was sponsored by the UMass Republican Club.

"When I was here there was no Republican Club. It's great to see democracy with a small "d" is still alive at UMass," Torkildsen said.

MassPIRG

The first skit of the evening related to MassPIRG's fight against hunger and homelessness. Freshman Dan Perrone, who is in charge of publicity for the hunger and homelessness campaign, narrated the skit about a hungry and homeless young woman. The skit intended to put viewers in the shoes of a homeless person in an attempt to describe the harshness of this person's lifestyle.

All MassPIRG members will also partake in the 14th Annual Hunger Cleanup on April 4. This is a one day community service work-a-thon in which students help clean shelters and abandoned lots, plant community gardens and volunteer at food pantries.

Next, a skit was performed by the group working towards getting the Pesticide Disclosure Act passed through the Massachusetts State Senate. The bill aims to ensure that people are forewarned of when pesticides are going to be sprayed in public areas.

In this skit, BJ Cortis wore a protective suit, gas mask, etc. because he was aware of the dangers of the pesticides around him. All other actors in the skit were forced to leave the stage due to suffering of symptoms from pesticide exposure. These symptoms include cancer, headaches and reproductive disorders to name a few.

According to Cortis, only 20 percent of Massachusetts public schools give proper warning when spraying pesticides. That means 80 percent of all public school students and faculty are exposed to toxic pesticides without ever knowing it. The high school Cortis attended was among the schools which sprayed without warning.

"I don't want this crap going into my kids' lungs like it did into mine," Cortis said.

Freshman Stephen Tanenbaum and other MassPIRG members are petitioning to pass the Miller Bill through congress. This bill would strengthen the Endangered Species Act, and promote the recovery of species instead of keeping them on the brink of extinction.

After Tanenbaum finished, Kristen Thibodeau spoke briefly of an Earth Day celebration she is planning for April. Thibodeau, who is media coordinator for Earth Day, is organizing a day long celebration to be held at Pulaski Park in Northampton. It is a Five College event.

Thibodeau wants more of the community to be involved in this celebration than in past ones. At the celebration, Thibodeau says she hopes to have a wide array of speakers, bands and business sponsors, particularly growers of organic produce.

"We want this to be the best Earth Day ever," Thibodeau said.

America."

Albright, a former professor of international affairs and head of the women in foreign policy program at Georgetown University, had more chance for dialogue with the students yesterday. She prefers a classroom setting, giving her a chance for an exchange of views with both critics and supporters of Clinton's threat to bomb Iraq if Saddam does not open his palaces and weapons sites to U.N. inspectors.

The protesters at Ohio State were far outnumbered by supporters and the undecided at St. John arena. But from the outset, when she began with the assertion, "Iraq is a long way from Ohio, but what happens there matters here," Albright, Cohen and Berger were confronted by jeering that sometimes drowned them out.

Others rose to the microphones with polite but sharp questions about U.S. goals in Iraq.

"I appreciate all of you coming," Berger said at the end of the 90-minute session. "I appreciate most of you listening." The majority of the students, faculty and others in the audience did listen. And Berger summed up the administration's case this way after saying he preferred a diplomatic solution to the dispute with Iraq. "There are some things worth fighting for. These include fighting aggression, fighting those who threaten their neighbors and to make this world safer and more secure for our children and yours."

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan is going to Baghdad in search of a diplomatic solution where Russia, France and the Arab League all have failed. Albright cautioned that the Clinton administration would not budge from its demand that the U.N. weapons commission have unlimited access in Iraq.

"It must be a true, not a phony, solution," she said, while Cohen and Berger offered assurances there would not be "significant losses" among the 30,000 American troops in the Persian Gulf in the event of an attack.

Many in the half-filled Ohio State sports arena appeared unswayed by the comments.

Dozens shouted out: "One, two, three, four, we don't want your racist war." Others held up antiwar banners and frequently interrupted the speakers.

Albright insisted Saddam "doesn't care a fig about his own people," but one protester, Rick Theis, said, "We, the people of Columbus and central Ohio, don't want to send a message with the blood of Iraqi women and children."

Women's track heads to A–10's

By Paul Teves
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's track and field team will head to Rhode Island this weekend for the Atlantic 10 Championships.

UMass has a real shot at winning if all their athletes can perform.

"We have a chance to score points in every event this weekend, if we compete at our best," coach Julie LaFreniere said. "We are the only team in the Atlantic 10, that can give the favored Virginia Tech squad a run for their money."

The UMass team will bring one of the most talented squads in the meet to Kingston. The numbers say that UMass should score in every event except for the pole vault, where they have no entry.

Teams like Dayton University have excellent sprinters and jumpers, while St. Joseph's and La Salle have great middle and long distance runners.

"Only Virginia Tech and UMass have the all-around teams to contend strongly for the title," LaFreniere said.

Certain seniors on the UMass team are being asked to assume leadership of this team and take on a bigger role. Both Rosey Bryan and Shelanda Irish have been asked by the coaches to compete in four events, while Rebecca Donaghue has been asked to run three middle and long distance events.

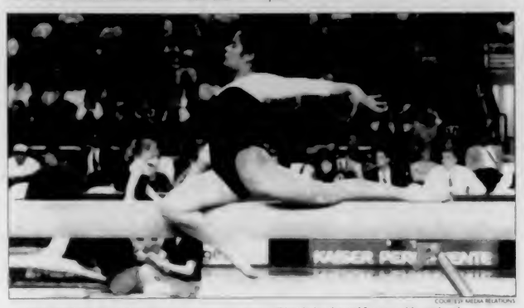
Bryan is expected to be a force in all four of her events, which include the long jump, triple jump, 55-meter dash and the 55-meter hurdles.

Irish is also a favorite in her events, ranking second going into the meet in the 200-meter and the 55-meter dash.

Donaghue is running in three distance events. She is expected to run in the 800, the mile and the 4x800 relay. However, the Stow, Mass. native goes into this meet with a slight leg injury acquired during a meet last weekend.

"I really want to do this and run the best that I can. I want to do this to help my team," Donaghue said.

"She is a really tough kid and this is what she wants to do," said LaFreniere regarding her senior standout.



In the 1000 meter race, Nicole Way and Monica Elmore are expected to do well for UMass. Way is one of the favorites in the event, but Elmore is one of those role players to watch out for. Her times have been improving and Coach LaFreniere is expecting her to step up to the challenge.

"Every point counts, and we need our improving runners like Elmore to get those tough points," LaFreniere said.

Coach LaFreniere expects the relay teams to come through because of their dual meet experience this season. UMass is used to running their relays at the end of meets, while other teams have been running their relay times at the beginning with fresh runners. This could be a huge advantage come this weekend for the Minutewomen.

The shot put also looks like a very strong scoring event for UMass. They field the freshman connection with Carol LaPlante and Alison Tostevin, who are expected to finish in the top three. Teammate Shannon Hamilton is also expected to place in the shot.

"We are asking a lot of this team, but we want to do this more than anything," LaFreniere said. "If Virginia Tech thinks they're just going to walk away with this title, they have another thing coming. Our kids will not let that happen."

Anita Sanyal and the UMass women's gymnastics team will battle for the A-10 crown this weekend.

Women's gym takes on MIT at Cage

By Justin Rudd
Collegian Staff

Bring in the guards.

There should be an all-out war in the Curry Hicks Cage tonight at 7 p.m. The No. 25 Massachusetts women's gymnastics team (7-0) takes to the floor in a tri-meet against the No. 9 West Virginia Mountaineers and the Engineers of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

The Minutewomen are coming off an inspiring victory over regional rival New Hampshire. UMass edged out the Wildcats to maintain their undefeated record.

The match was highlighted with stellar performances from virtually all ends of the squad, led by junior Betsy Colucci and freshman phenom Jill Fisher.

The Minutewomen step confidently and carefully into Friday's match, for No. 9 West Virginia is one of, if not the most threatening squad, on the UMass schedule. The fact that the M.I.T. Engineers are in attendance as well is not exactly a plus either.

The Mountaineers bring with them to the mat an undefeated record of 9-0 accompanied by a 20-meet regular season winning streak. WVU is a little upset to say the least, for UMass is one of only five schools to defeat the Mountaineers in their home, the Coliseum within the past five seasons.

"UMass has always been tough for us," WVU coach Linda Burdette said.

There is no need to get discouraged though, because the Mountaineers are not at full strength. The visitors will be without the services of team leaders juniors Jodi Barnes, Jessica Nonnemacher and Rebecca Slobig.

With the absences of these gymnasts the Minutewomen have an opportunity to defeat one of their biggest rivals and maintain their undefeated record. Not to mention the profound affect a victory would have on their national ranking.

But let's not forget M.I.T. Despite not being nationally ranked, the Engineers still present a promising threat to both the Minutewomen and the Mountaineers. M.I.T. has a very talented squad which is led by Sonja Ellefson and is accompanied by Alli Christenson, and Nann Kronschnabel.

Should the Minutewomen emerge victorious tonight over a pair of quality opponents, they should have the added momentum needed to push them over the top heading into the final weeks of the season.

Men's tennis faces Temple

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

Most athletic teams at the University of Massachusetts are quite familiar with the opponent when it is the Temple Owls.

However, the men's tennis team has not yet had the opportunity to engage in a rivalry with the Atlantic 10 foes from Philadelphia.

The Minutemen appear ready for the challenge as they attempt to battle the favored Owls on Sunday morning at the Ludlow Tennis Club.

Temple is ranked number 108 in the nation, which is good for second-best ranking in the Atlantic 10.

"This is a major test for our team," Massachusetts men's tennis coach Judy Dixon said. "This is a true quality opponent and we are about to see what the next level of competition is all about."

Only Virginia Tech, which ranks at 28th in the nation, places higher than Temple in the conference.

The Minutemen are in the middle of the A-10 pack, but have posted tremendous records over the last two seasons.

"We have won the vast majority of our matches over the past couple of years, but we have not been playing against teams like Temple," Dixon said.

"Certainly, they will be the toughest challenge for our team this year, unless we run into Virginia Tech in the A-10 tournament."

That possibility aside, the players have been preparing vigorously this battle all week in practice.

"This team is ready for Temple," freshman Parsa Samii said. "The fact that we are playing a ranked team is a big chance for us, and the team is really pumped up for it."

The Temple squad is comprised from players from around the world. Their top three players are prime examples.

Temple's No. 1 seed Fazal Sied hails from Calcutta, and will provide an immense challenge for Todd Cheney. Alex Carrentirro, who will be matched against Rob Manchester is from Rio De Janeiro, Brazil. Number three seed Metias Skjorshammer originates from Oslow, Norway and will be pitted against Alex Aller.

"We want to compete against teams like this," Dixon said. "They are a step ahead of us right now, but we want to add more teams like this to our schedule, but we must be able to play competitive tennis against them."

Coach Dixon desperately wants the trend of improved doubles play, and production out of the lower portion of the singles order to continue on Sunday.

"I'm counting on guys like Bo Navarro and Parsa Samii at the four and five spots to continue to play great tennis, Dixon said. "They have played well thus far, and we need them to get us points to stay in matches."

Todd Cheney will need to be at the top of his game this weekend when the Minutemen face Temple.

You see, the Minutemen do not have an easy road after this weekend's action, and the last two weeks of the season hold games against No. 4 Boston University, No. 8 BC and Maine.

If something is going to be done, then this has to be the time for UMass, and it will have to be done by players like sophomore Jeff Blanchard, senior Dan Iuden and freshman Kris Wallis. With Lovell out of the lineup, these three players will have to jumpstart a slumping offense that has only scored five goals in the last four games.

The defense held the Wildcats to four goals in the Minutemen's 4-1 loss at Durham on Feb. 6, so the offense will have to make up that margin for success. Doing it any other way will severely risk the postseason — and if UMass does not make the postseason, it will be the first time since the program's reinstatement that UMass has not made the conference playoffs.

Support Asian American studies

The night of Monday, Feb. 2, 1998 was cold and somewhat windy. Yet, that night, almost 80 students from the Five Colleges crammed themselves into a classroom intended for a fourth as many students. We were confused, afraid, excited and proud. Some were confused because, somehow, this tiny classroom was chosen to house a class so large. Others were afraid because they were not pre- registered, and now wondered if luck would ever shine their way. A few were more than excited, as their struggle and efforts to create this opportunity had come to fruition in a most overwhelmingly successful way. And almost all of us were so deeply proud to see a classroom overflowing with fellow Asian and Asian American students.

You might (or might not) be surprised that this classroom was not about to receive a lecture on science, math or engineering. This class was going to learn something that has seldom ever graced the so–called "diverse" curriculum here at UMass Amherst. This class was an introduction to Asian American Studies.

Xenon Yuan

For those that don't know, Asian American Studies is an interdisciplinary field dedicated to the history, culture, and literature of Americans with Asian and Pacific Islander descent. It differs from Asian Studies because it deals not with Asia, but America. Asian American history predates the Constitution by hundreds of years. Before the Chinese of San Francisco, there were the Filipinos of Louisiana; the latter made their mark on the Mississippi delta In 1760, and, in California, hundreds of years before the first Cantonese gold miner. The nation of Hawaii has even deeper roots.

Asian American history is American history. But we usually never learn much about why Asians were the only group of people ever to have been legally barred from entering this country on the sole basis of skin color. Why did this nation's leaders send Japanese Americans into concentration camps when they did no wrong? Why are so many struggling communities suddenly being revitalized by new populations of Southeast Asian refugees? Why are we a "model minority" when the 1990 census showed that in Boston we are poorer than both whites and blacks? Why is the rate of hate crimes against Asian Americans rising faster than ever before? And why was there a nationwide witchhunt for "foreign" political contributions, when most of those scrutinized for giving money were actually American citizens and permanent residents?

Why? Well, because the rest of America still renders us invisible and foreign. We are "un–American." Consequently, we do not know about our own history. Our struggle. Our identity. On that cold and windy Monday night, our professor, Chris Iijima, asked each of us why we came to class. A fundamental theme permeated almost every response: "I want to learn about myself"

Asian American Studies is about more than just learning history, or even earning a degree. It is about claiming what is rightfully ours as well: to be able to call America our home.

Unfortunately, the administration has not opened its arms to us. For over a generation, students from UMass and the Five Colleges have been consistently denied the funding and resources for either a department or even a program. Thus, students coped with teaching themselves. Over the years, certain departments have sponsored courses taught by unpaid graduate students. Although successful in the short–term, this is pitiful in the long run. Last semester, no courses at UMass what–so–ever dealt specifically with the Asian American experience. Quite ironic, considering that we comprise the largest non–white ethnic group on campus.

Through the efforts of the Asian American Studies Task Force (formally unsupported by the University), we were able to offer Race, Law and the Asian American Experience. Never before have we had a fully paid (albeit visiting and non–permanent) professor teaching introductory Asian American Studies. By the end of Fall '97, there were almost 30 students pre–registered. The Task Force then submitted a formal request to provost Cora Marrett asking to discuss the obvious student interest in Asian American Studies.

In a seemingly unconcerned response, the Provost suggested we return to working with the Deans — the same people whom had suggested us to move on to work with the very top of the administration. Perhaps the Provost considers the interest of over 30 pre–registered students, numerous faculty and over 20 years of struggle unimportant?

Well, this time around, we have the circumstance of 80 students in attendance to demonstrate just how serious we are. Professor Iijima's creation of two sections to accommodate such irrepressible demand should be reason enough for the Provost to reconsider. Or do we have to stress again that this is a once–a–week, two–and–a–half hour, nighttime class costing us over $70 in textbooks? Perhaps we must emphasize that only the "Diversity" GenEd requirement is fulfilled? Maybe we must highlight that this class fills none of the core course prerequisites for any major, minor or certificate program on campus? These students are here on their own accord. They are in desperate need; their thirst for knowledge and self–exploration is unmatched. With continued lack of respect from the administration their message boils down to this: Asian Americans are not legitimate members of American society.

Regardless of how we go about doing it, we will make history. We are moving forward. It's up to the administration at UMass Amherst to decide which side it wants to be remembered as supporting.

Questioning freedom

Are we free? This is a vital question. It is a question which reaches to the very heart of the nature of human beings, and the very purpose of government. Americans tend to think that the United States is the land of the free. But what is freedom, and are we really enjoying the benefits of living in a truly free nation?

Now I am not going to argue that the United States is ruled by a tyrannical, totalitarian government, but there are so many obstacles to freedom which can be encountered everywhere in the world, and many due to government, one has to wonder if we are truly a free society.

Webster's New Collegiate Dictionary defines freedom as the absence of necessity, coercion or constraint in choice or action. By that definition alone we do not live in a truly free world, but this is where responsibility comes into effect.

Jason Eiseman

Obviously we can not allow people to run rampant killing each other. But as long as you don't impede someone else's freedom, what is wrong with true, uninhibited freedom?

The first obstacle to freedom I will mention may be the most obvious and subtle at the same time. Money is one of the greatest represeners of freedom in the history of human kind. What is the best way to keep someone servile, to repress their freedom? Keep them in poverty. People without money do not have the libertie others do.

Everything boils down to money, all human action. Why do we work and why are we at a university? To get money. Why do we need money? Because in today's society money equals freedom. With money you have the freedom to live where you want, to live the way you want. Money provides access to certain privileges which are shut out to people without money.

The rich have more options, the rich have more access, and consequently the rich have fewer restraints on them. By the definition I established before, the rich have more freedom than the poor, because they can afford freedom. But even they are not truly free because of the government.

What is the function of government? In the case of the United States, the main purpose of the government is to provide defense for all the states in the union. Instead our government thinks it is their responsibility to save us from ourselves.

The government should not be trying to save us, the government should let people choose their own lives. Congress passed a bill which tried to outlaw certain types of material from the Internet. Luckily, the bill was found to be unconstitutional, but it shows us that Congress is spending its precious time worrying about how people use their computers.

Our government is becoming more and more repressive. One of the examples of this is the attempt by government to regulate morals. When the government says that having sex, or doing drugs, or saying certain words, or doing certain things are immoral, they take away our personal freedom. An example I like to use to illustrate the way in which government regulates morals are laws against incest.

While I don't condone incest, what people do with their own lives is none of my business. I don't think brothers and sisters should have that type of relationship, but no one, especially the government, has any kind of right to tell them how to live their lives. Some people say that they could have children that are born with birth defects. That is another issue, and that is not why incest illegal. Incest is a remnant from the days when the Bible dictated the law, and that is why it is illegal.

One of the greatest examples of the way government represses individual freedom is the stance the government takes on drugs and prostitution. George Carlin has a joke where he says (in words I can not 'print), sex is legal and selling is legal, so why isn't selling sex legal? Carlin uses humor to expose the way in which government arbitrarily represses freedom.

Some people say that many diseases can be spread through prostitution, and prostitutes are often victims of violence. Well, if it's legalized, the government can regulate it, and test the prostitutes, and make the whole situation more safe. The same process can be used with drugs.

Legalize drugs, keep them safe and provide help for those who are addicted and want help. We are losing the war on drugs. History has shown that prohibition in this country has never worked.

Government's regulation of morals can not be tolerated. Some people may say that I am reactionary, that we are not at a point where our government has completely become "Big Brother." But we are getting there. Orwell's nightmare is fast becoming our reality; we have to prevent the government's regulation of the moral decisions and actions of society.

The divide between the rich and the poor is growing, meaning that more people are becoming sub–servient to the rich.

Money and government are just two of the forces which are repressing our freedom. If we do not stop the machine in the near future we will lose our freedom. If that happens, nothing else is worth a damn.

Letters to the Editor

GEO speaks out

To the editor:

The Feb. 17 article in the Collegian on the GEO impasse contains a significant misunderstanding which must be immediately rectified. Susan Pearson's statement is untrue and misleads the entire campus community.

She claims that GEO never completed a certification process. This statement implies GEO either did not wish to complete this process or was negligent in not doing so. Nothing could be further from the truth.

The issue of certification brought up by Susan Pearson is a union busting tactic. As a member of GEO's bargaining committee, I want to point out both parties agreed certification was not necessary because GEO was voluntarily recognized by the UMass administration. Both GEO and the administration agreed at the bargaining table that mere formalities remained.

Since Jan. 30, GEO has pushed to have these formalities resolved, however the administration refused to allow GEO to do so. The administration's refusal to allow GEO to complete the mere formalities of voluntary recognition coupled with the administration's illegal declaration of impasse in bargaining last week, make it apparent that the administration had impasse in mind as it refused GEO's wish to formalize the voluntary recognition. This refusal to allow GEO to formalize their voluntary recognition is now being used as a weapon to cripple GEO's status as a union. Furthermore, this refusal and the impasse demonstrate a clear attempt on the part of the UMass administration to bust unions campus wide.

Susan E. Shadwick
Graduate student

To the editor:

While we had hoped that contract negotiations between the University administration and the Graduate Employee Organization would proceed forward to a settlement in a reasonable amount of time, apparently that is not the case. We now feel that the time to settle has come. We write to urge the University administration to reach a negotiated settlement with GEO which addresses their concerns: concerns which we find both valid and important.

GEO's contract proposals are made with the sincere intention of making this University truly a better place. While it is not our place to insert ourselves into the specifics of negotiations, we believe that GEO's proposals would have the effect of addressing serious issues which face this campus.

It has become clear to us — as faculty who deal directly with graduate applicants — that maintaining wages and benefits competitive with peer Universities is essential. Too often, we are forced to simply watch as the best applicants decide to go elsewhere, to schools which can provide better funding or more comprehensive health care. If we are to ensure that this University maintains its status as one of the preeminent homes of scholarship into the 21st century, we must provide a concrete way to attract the best scholars.

Another measure of the strength of a community can be found in its diversity and in its commitment to diversity. All kinds of diversity are important: racial, ethnic, economic, geographic, cultural, historical. It is no secret that this campus has been slowly becoming more homogenous over the past years. We believe that the administration should look upon the GEO contract as an opportunity to reverse this trend and allow the University to become more accessible to everyone.

Two years into GEO negotiations, we are weary of this entire process. We are frustrated that our students lack a contract, and that they feel they must continually protest in order to be heard. Now that the issue of GEO's certification has been addressed, we do not understand why the administration has not yet shown the necessary vision to settle a contract with the union. GEO's proposals seem, to us, not only reasonable, fair and in the best interests of all GEO members, but also in the best interest of the entire University. We urge the administration to take these interests into consideration.

Safe and sound

Some of you refer to me as Slump, while most of you know me as housemate A or B. That is rather unfortunate, because you probably don't think there is much more to me than drinking and making fun of Luke Meredith. There usually isn't, but I have always wanted to write an editorial for the Daily Collegian, only I didn't have anything to say. Until now.

There are some people in this world who carry things around with them for sentimentality. Be it jewelry, a lucky penny or even a baseball card (ask the pimp daddy about that one).

I, on the other hand, used to carry a safety pin with me. Why did I carry a safety pin? It all goes back to the 10th grade when a special friend gave it to me and told me to always keep it with me for safety. She used to be part of this posse, consisting of about four of her best friends, and they would all stick the safety pins on their jeans so that they would be safe. I was always making fun of them, until one day she decided that I should have one.

Eric Schmuler

I guess she didn't think I was very safe? I wasn't down with the whole pin on the jeans thing, but I thought about it and for some reason it made sense. If I carry the safety pin with me, I will be safe. I thought it was cute, so I kept it in my wallet for six years. Six years. That is a long time to carry around a damn safety pin. I guess you should say I grew quite attached to it. I was actually a little embarrassed to admit that I carried it with me, and, before today, only a handful of people even knew that I had it.

Recently, this girl I have been dating for about a year, on and off of course, decided that we should break–up. I'd say "we" decided, but is it ever really a mutual break up? No, so let me rephrase that. She wanted to break–up.

With graduation four months away, there have been a couple of important questions that she and I had been asking ourselves. I am sure some of you couples out there can relate.

Should we stay together?

Should we go our separate ways?

Well, I didn't even get a chance to answer those questions. She had already thought about it, and two Saturdays ago we broke–up so that neither of us would get too attached when and if we decide to go our separate ways in May.

Needless to say, I was pretty upset all week long, but despite what Luke may tell you, I did not drink. That's how upset I was. I didn't even feel like drinking. All I could think about was that she and I were breaking up now to avoid it in May. Are you confused? So was I.

She and I have been through so much together and now I wasn't going to get the opportunity to go through my last semester at UMass with her.

Before I left her dorm room I did something I never thought I would do. I gave her my safety pin. I never thought I would meet someone who was special enough to me that I would give the safety pin to, but I have.

At first she was reluctant to take it, knowing what it had meant to me. But, I told her that if she kept it, I would always be with her and she would be safe.

Safe is a feeling that I, along with many other people have felt the last four years here at UMass. Unfortunately, the feeling is slipping away from me, and I grow scared about where I will be one year from now.

You know how it is when you first come to UMass as a freshman. You think this is the best place ever and you are going to spend the next four years (or five or six) of your life here.

Sure you go home during the summer and winter sessions, but you still know in the back of your mind that you will be coming back to good old UMass. That is a safe feeling. This may be coming as quite a shock to some of you freshmen and sophomores out there, but it is true. One day you will have to leave this place.

My housemates tell me that giving my safety pin away is kind of like me admitting to myself that it is time to move on to a new life. A life after UMass. Where that will be, I have no idea, but at least I have this wake up call so I can prepare for that new life. We can't spend the rest of our lives in Amherst, no matter how safe it makes us feel.

It is possible that many of you graduating couples out there are not dealing with this situation, and boy are you lucky.

But there are probably a few out there that can relate to this dilemma. If you are one of those couples out there that is going through this, I wish you good luck and a happy ending.

The girl I've been dating and I got back together six days later. Hey, no one said these things would be easy. All I know is that I am happy once again, and even if we can't be together one year from now — at least I will have these last four months with her.

And, oh yeah, she still has the safety pin. Who knows, maybe six years from now she'll still have it.

Sphere wastes talents of Hoffman & Stone

By Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

SPHERE
Directed by Barry Levinson with Dustin Hoffman, Sharon Stone, Samuel L. Jackson
Playing at Mountain Farms Theaters

Michael Crichton's novel Sphere was written way back in 1987, and perhaps it's a sign that it took 11 years for a movie version to show up. An essentially cerebral and technical story, the film version is therefore only carried by three A–list stars and Crichton's gift for suspense. It's not nearly enough — for all the imagination and wonder the movie hypes up, it barely registers as a functional adaption.

Directing with quick editing and frequent tension, Barry Levinson and his writers keep faithful to the original novel, right down to chapter–like title cards like "The Deep" and "The Monster." It's not the only time they give things away too quickly.

The premise is intriguing. In the middle of the Pacific Ocean, a spacecraft is found deep below and called in to investigate are a psychologist, a biochemist, a mathematician and an astrophysicist. The ship is 300 years old. It contains a mysterious, alluring golden sphere.

Only problem is, Levinson (Diner, Rainman) — for all his talents — is no Steven Spielberg. He doesn't know how to show awe and wonder, so when the characters descend into the ocean depths, and gasp with "Oh, look at that!" at the bland, clunky spaceship for the first time, we're wondering if there was supposed to be a better special effects shot that somehow never made it into the film.

Little time is spent as well, mistakenly, exploring the spacecraft. Levinson wants his actors to start acting and his twists and turns to start twisting and turning. And they do quite well, thanks to the cast and the usual Crichton computer–driven plot devices.

Dustin Hoffman is on hand to play the psychologist, and makes the most of his functional role, especially late in the film. But most surprising are Sharon Stone and the always great Samuel L. Jackson. The icy Stone, portraying — of all things — a biochemist, shows off her acting chops, even if her character's weird actions are conveniently excused to be psychotic behavior. Jackson is a gift — able to be charismatic and horribly mocking at the same time.

The actors here are the only advantage the movie has over the superior novel, and even that was thick and uneven. Levinson is so concerned with creating tension and conflict that he forgets to make things plausible.

The book is also timply too complex to adapt. Revealing the main mysteries too quickly, the audience all but cringes when Hoffman and Stone finally figure things out.

Despite all of these things, however, Sphere manages to stay interesting. In the hands of such film–making talent, it's not a bad movie. But it never knows what avenue to take. You can't promise the action movie crowd big special effects and expect an odd killer jellyfish sequence to suffice.

But more importantly, Sphere, more than any other Crichton novel, is a story originally designed for science fiction fans. The hooks — the spaceship, the sphere, the exploration of what manifests inside of us — demand a lot of attention to detail. We also expect a big moment like the arrival of the mother ship in Close Encounters of the Third Kind, but all we get are couple of fake "oohs" and "ahhs," a lot of philosophical talk, and a big golden Christmas bulb floating up to the sky. UMass bassist to perform in NoHo

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

As part of the "Four Sundays in February" series, the Northampton Arts Council will be presenting an inter– generational fiddle fest in celebration of Claude "Fiddler" Williams' 90th birthday called "Strung Together," which will be presented this Sunday at 2 p.m. at Northampton's Academy of Music.

Joining this "King of Kansas" will be 71–year–old fiddler Johnny Gimble, the "King of Texas Swing," from Bob Wills and the Texas Playboys, 71–year–old guitarist Bucky Pizzarelli from the Vaughn Monroe and Benny Goodman Orchestras, Miri Ben–Ari, the 25–year–old Israeli violin phenomenon, and Sam Amidon, 16–year–old violinist from Brattleboro, VT.

Also joining this wide array of talented musicians is University of Massachusetts bassist Genevieve Rose, who has achieved much success this year and has received many accolades from the jazz community.

Rose is a freelance acoustic and electric bassist. At UMass, she is majoring in jazz performance and music education. Rose has performed regionally with jazz, big band, Dixieland, vocal and Latin ensembles.

Rose began her career in music at the age of eight. She started taking lessons in classical guitar at the Community Music Center School of Springfield.

In junior high school, Rose, who had a desire to play in the jazz band which already had two guitar players and no bass player, learned to play the electric bass. She soon discovered a stand bass, and she decided that it was the instrument she wanted to play. Without any formal lessons, Rose taught herself to play the upright bass.

Now a junior at UMass, Rose has many awards, including UMass' Billy Taylor/Fletcher Henderson award. In 1996, she won the National Foundation for the Advancement of the Arts Honorable Mention award for jazz double bass. Rose is also the former Massachusetts (MMEA/MENC) All–State jazz bassist and the recipient of twenty consecutive M–V.P. awards from high school music festivals in Canada and throughout New England.

Along with her numerous awards, Rose has performed and continues to perform with a number of established jazz musicians. In 1997, Rose had the opportunity to meet with Benny Waters, the renowned horn legend, when he came to Northampton for the "Outrageous Octogenarians" show which was also presented by the Northampton Council for the Arts. The next day, she performed with him at a public workshop at the Martin Luther King Jr. Center in Springfield. That one gig led Rose to perform again with Waters at Sweet Basil's in New York, last October. Rose has also previously worked with Claude "Fiddler" Williams, in Utica, N.Y., and at Northampton's Iron Horse Music Hall.

Recently, Rose performed in the musicals Beehive: The 60's Musical and Five Guys Named Moe at Stage West in Springfield. She was also involved with 1997 Henry Mancini Institute Workshop, where she performed with Ray Brown, Dave Grushin, Dick Hyman and Bob Mintzer, in Long Beach, CA.

She'll be part of the UMass Faculty's upcoming European tour, "Tradewinds," this coming summer.

"What I like most about playing with these men is that it's like playing with history. Benny and I are 75 years apart in age, and we're able to communicate musically. There's no generation gap in the music," Rose said.

Tickets are now available at the Northampton Arts Council, Memorial Hall, 240 Main St., Northampton, and at the State Street Street Fruit Store and Guild Art Centre in Northampton. For the Record in Amherst. Tickets are also available by credit card at the Academy of Music Theater, 584–9032, between 1 and 5 p.m., Monday through Friday. 1998 DUBOIS LECTURE
Dr. Randolph W. Bromery, President of Springfield College and former Chancellor of UMass Amherst, will deliver the 1998 W.E.B. DuBois Lecture on Monday, February 23rd, the 130th anniversary of Dr. DuBois' birth. Horoscopes

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — There are those you can go to today for advice; someone you talk to has been through it all before, and can tell you which way to turn.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Your social surroundings will offer more than enjoyment today. You will get a few exciting ideas that could yield great profit.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Things are on the upswing at this time, but you must take care that your optimism correctly reflects what you think lies ahead.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You and a group of friends will have to make a decision today regarding the next day's plans. Wait until tomorrow and options will be limited.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You may want to wait a while today before joining the conversation. You want to be sure that you have all the facts before speaking up.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You must be a little more concerned than usual today about safety and security in and around the home. Make no errors that could increase risks.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You are likely to be far more sensitive to comments than usual today. You must remember that not everything is meant to hurt your feelings.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Seeds will be planted today that will demand continual tending, but you may have to ask someone else to give you a hand with the cultivation.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — The shape of things to come will be clearer to you today after you reconcile two conflicting notions in your mind.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Focus on what is most concrete today. The more you concentrate on things that are vague and unclear, the more confused you're likely to be.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You may attract a bit of critical attention today, simply because there are those who have to have someone to talk about. Take it lightly.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — You are going to have one or two difficult decisions to make before the day is out. You must be circumspect, as others are sure to be affected.

Minutewomen step it up in 68-55 win over George Washington

JOHN BURT/COLLEGIAN

Alison MacFarland had 10 points for the Minutewomen in their win over George Washington last night.

Collegian Staff

As the Atlantic 10 Eastern Division's second–place team, the Massachusetts women's basketball squad (16–9, 9–5) entered last night's game at the William D. Mullins Center versus A–10 rival George Washington riding high a five– game win streak.

So were the Colonials.

In fact, George Washington is first overall in the A–10 with an impressive (17–8, 11–4) record. Garnering the league's respect in the past four or five years, the Colonials hadn't lost in Amherst since Feb. 18, 1993, the Minutewomen's only win over them in over 11 years.

GW	55

But last night was Senior Night, the last regular season game at home, and the team wanted to send the senior captains Sabriya Mitchell and Kara Tudman off in style. They also wanted continue their winning streak and attempt to tie St. Joseph's for first place in the A–10 East.

In past recent first halves, the Minutewomen have been sluggish. A run here, a lull there, but never really catching momentum until crunch time in the middle of the second half. A mix of scorers had stepped it up each game. But it was last call for two of the Minutewomen, as they came out on fire from the start.

In the first half, both teams were hitting their shots and neither could rally off more than a short–lived lead. But UMass proved a more versatile squad with four players scoring four or more points, while Tez Kraft and Elisa Aguilar totaled seventy–five percent of George Washington's offense.

Junior Tez Kraft, the most consistent scorer for UMass all season, began the charge on the Colonials with a pair of three–pointers. She lit up for a career–high 25 points, including a four–for–five night from behind the three–point arc. She also snagged eight rebounds, grabbed one steal and did not commit a turnover.

"I wanted to give them (the seniors) something to go out on," Kraft said. "I just happened to be hot tonight."

"Kraft really hurt us tonight," George Washington coach Joe McKeown said. "She wanted to take the game over at times."

Both teams were hitting their shots as the "Spanish Connection" of sophomore Aguilar and junior Gomez, both of Madrid, Spain, got their team off and running. Aguilar had seven within the first five minutes and Gomez, who was just three points off reaching the 1,000–point milestone before the game, showed off her outside shot by draining a pair of 15–footers. But she also proved her vulnerability as well with a wealth of turnovers, a team–high six.

"We couldn't go on a run to build one," McKeown said. "We got sloppy, we seemed a little out of it at times and they came to play."

Mitchell, while controlling the point for UMass throughout the game, set a record of her own tonight as she became the UMass career assist leader with 541, including a game–high eight against the Colonials.

Freshman Kathy Coyner did not disappoint her mentor, Mitchell, either. She tallied 22 points, also a career high, including a pair of three–pointers, and a 10–for–12 night at the line. Junior Yolanda Rayside posted up for six points and added eight rebounds as UMass dominated the boards 35–25.

Gomez continued scoring where she had left off while Aguilar cooled off to only tally five in the second half. The rest of the Colonials could only muster 18 points, including seven from Katarina Baskova.

"It's a great feeling, it's senior night, we're at home, it's a good crowd," Tudman said. "It's just a wonderful feeling."

With the win, UMass is now tied for first in the A–10 East with St Joseph's. Saturday, they face St. Bonaventure for their last regular season game. They will face George Washington again on Tuesday for the opening round of the A–10 tournament at the Mullins Center.

Seniors say farewell with a bang; Kraft scores career-high 25 points

By Jackie Leroux
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team sure knows how to throw their graduating seniors a good party.

Last night's game against George Washington was the final senior night for guard Sabriya Mitchell and forward Kara Tudman, and the Minutewomen sent their co–captains out in style. With junior Tez Kraft and freshman Kathy Coyner having career–high scoring nights, the Minutewomen thrashed their long–time rival George Washington.

"Joanie gave us a good pep talk before the game about how these two have worked since they've been here," Kraft said. "These two have been great leaders for the rest of us, and we wanted to give them something to go out on, to beat a team like GW that we haven't beaten since we got here."

Kraft scored a career–high 25 points and pulled down eight rebounds. Coyner had a career–high 22, knocking down 10 of 12 from the free–throw line, and handing out four assists.

The two seniors were honored along with their families at a ceremony prior to the game.

"It was a good feeling," Tudman said. "It was senior night, we were home, there was a good crowd. It's just a wonderful feeling."

Mitchell had a career night of her own against the Colonials. With her first assist in the game she became UMass' career assist leader, as she had tied Christel Zullo's mark of 533 with a four–assist performance against St Joe's on Saturday.

The Newark, N.J., native gathered eight assists last night and now needs only seven more to break the record for most assists in a single season. Zullo currently holds the mark with 162. Mitchell should break the record in UMass final regular season game against St. Bonaventure on Saturday. Her average currently ranks her second in the Atlantic 10 under the assists category.

The senior point guard has led the Minutewomen in assists in all four seasons. This season was actually her second time around as a senior, as she qualified for another season of eligibility after sitting out her freshman year.

The senior co–captain also leads the team in steals this season with 59. She is ranked fifth in the A–10 for steals with an average of 2.5. She also has the fourth best assist–to– turnover ratio in the conference at 1.5.

Tudman was used sparingly in her first two seasons at UMass, but emerged as a starter last season, and has started every game this season. She has been a key player for the Minutewomen on the defensive end, and a force on the boards.

Tudman had a career–high 10 rebounds against St. Joe's last Saturday, and scored a season–high 10 points against Rhode Island on Feb. 4.

Mitchell and Tudman were both part of the 1995–96 squad that won the Atlantic 10 title and went to the NCAA tournament for the first time in school history. With last night's tremendous win over GW, the Minutewomen suddenly see themselves faced with the possibility yet again. George Washington is the top team in the Atlantic 10, and last night's win was a breakthrough achievement for UMass.

"It's a great game for us, because maybe now we'll get a little respect," UMass coach Joanie O'Brien said. "Anytime you beat a top team in your conference it's a breakthrough game too."

With last night's win the Minutewomen are currently tied with St. Joseph's for first place in the Atlantic 10 Eastern Division. Pre–season coaches polls actually predicted UMass to finish second in the A–10 East. UMass is now on a seven game win streak, with just one more regular season game to play tomorrow afternoon at St. Bonaventure.

UMass hockey faces tough task with two matches against UNH

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

Like a roller coaster ride, the Massachusetts hockey team can either enjoy the view from the top of the coaster, or plummet at mind–boggling speed to the bottom this weekend. The Minutemen will have to climb out of the hole dug by the shellacking at Maine last weekend, and inch as an agonizingly slow pace to the top as they take on No. 3 New Hampshire in a home–and–home series.

Tonight, UMass travels to Durham, N.H. and will try to weather the ill will of Wild E. Cat and the Whittemore Center faithful, while the Wildcats will return the favor this Sunday in a Mullins Center matinee at 2 p.m..

All alliteration aside, if you can say that sentence five times fast, then you have gained a glimpse of the difficult task facing the Minutemen (5–20–2, 2–15–1 in Hockey East): especially without the services of senior captain Tim Lovell, who is still under suspension by the coaching staff.

In this finale of the season series with UNH (21–5–1, 13–4–1 in HE), UMass will once again try to break the 25–year winless drought against the Wildcats (a 4–1 win on Feb. 23, 1963). Also, the Minutemen will have to bear the brunt of the top offense in the conference, if not the nation.

The four–headed offensive beast of Jason Krog, Derek Bekar, Tom Nolan and Mark Mowers has together compiled an astounding 184 points this season. Defensively, goaltender Sean Marile was named HE Player of the Week when he set the new HE career shutout record last weekend against Providence (six shutouts).

And with that sweep of Providence, UNH is now tied for the HE lead with No. 8 Boston College at 27 points apiece.

If the Minutemen can steal a win this weekend, it will be the top moment of the season, and also the biggest win since their upset of then–No. 1 Maine on Jan. 28, 1995. A win will also get them back in the race for the final playoff spot in the conference, while the team standing three points above them in the standings, Merrimack College, faces off in a home–and–home series against a red hot Lowell squad.

However, if UMass repeats their effort last weekend against the Black Bears (outscored by a 18–3 margin), where they did plummet to an all–new depth, then you can put another nail in the coffin of postseason hopes.

UMass looks to rebound vs. St. Joe's

By Corey Peter Goodman
Collegian Staff

Can the Massachusetts men's basketball team rebound from Wednesday's emotionally–draining loss to Rhode Island?

That's a question coach Bruiser Flint and UMass will try to answer when they host the cellar–dwelling St. Joseph's Hawks this Saturday (12 p.m., ESPN, WHMP–FM, WMUA– FM) at the William D. Mullins Center.

Before tip–off, UMass will honor senior Tyrone Weeks who'll be playing his final home game at UMass.

A year ago, Weeks — a Proposition 48 victim as a freshman which forfeited his eligibility after he failed to meet NCAA academic requirements in his senior year of high school — was honored as a member of the senior class that included guards Edgar Padilla and Carmelo Travieso.

However, when the new Proposition 68 was established late last season — rewarding former Prop 48 athletes who graduated in four years with a fifth year of eligibility — Weeks took advantage of it.

Besides leading the Minutemen on the court this season, Weeks, a Philadelphia native, is working towards completing a second degree in Afro–American Studies, after already earning a bachelor's degree in Education last summer.

Weeks has been a three–year starter for UMass, and most memorably, a pivotal force at power forward during the team's 1996 Final Four run.

Last season, when former big man Marcus Camby left for the National Basketball Association, Weeks became a floor leader for UMass — averaging more than 12 points a game with almost nine rebounds.

With the emergence of scorers like Monty Mack and Charlton Clarke this season, Weeks has turned the focus towards the defensive end. He currently leads UMass in rebounds with over nine a game, a career–high.

Flint, who has coached Weeks throughout his career at UMass, isn't excited about saying good–bye.

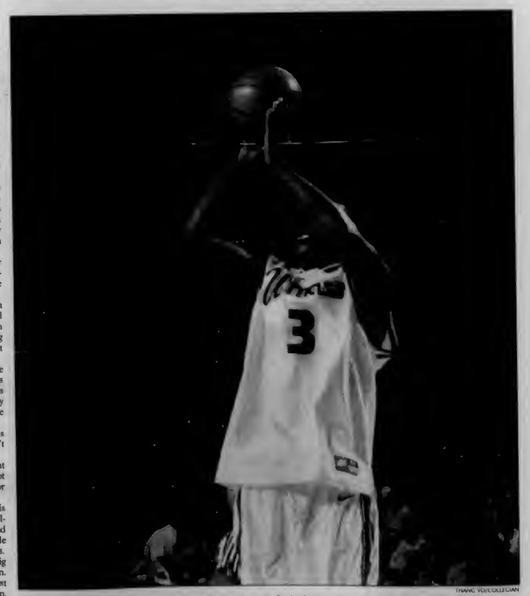
"I'm really going to miss him," Flint said. "He's been very special to me, not just as a player. It'll be a special day for him. He's a great kid."

Saturday's game against the Hawks is a fitting ending for Weeks, who is familiar with the Philadelphia program, and who can remember a few memorable battles with some talented Hawks clubs.

However, the Hawks have been a big disappointment in the A–10 this season. After making a name for themselves last season, with an A–10 Championship, the tournament MVP and a pair of wins in the NCAA's, the Hawks (9–14, 2–11 A–10) have not lived up to their billing.

It began before the season when the team's second–leading scorer from last year, Arthur "Yah" Davis, was deemed academically ineligible for the season. Considering the graduation loss of Dmitri Domani, last season's A–10 Defensive Player of the Year and a career 1,000–point scorer, Flint knows the Hawks have been playing short–handed.

"They are struggling right now," Flint said. "When you lose guys like they lost, it's real tough to win games."



Senior point guard Rashid Bey is coach Phil Martelli's top gun. Considered a pre–season all–American candidate, Bey leads St. Joseph's with 16.6 points per content. He is also the team's top three–point threat, having hit 60 already this season.

"We just have to guard him, and we'll be alright," Flint said. "It starts with stopping the penetration."

Following the loss to Rhode Island, UMass finds itself in jeopardy of losing the top seed heading into the conference tournament. The Minutemen have a one game edge on both Rhode Island and Temple with three games left, including a date against the Owls on March 1.

Flint, however, said there is one simple solution.

"Win all three games," he said. "That's what I told the guys. If we take care of our own business, we don't have to worry about anybody else."

Algerian group stages second ambush

ALGIERS, Algeria (AP) — An armed group attacked and killed 19 people riding in a transport truck on a deserted mountain road in eastern Algeria, newspapers reported Sunday.

It was the second highway ambush reported in recent days. Both took place on Friday.

No one claimed responsibility for the attack that occurred near Ojiel, a town with a civilian militia 180 miles east of Algiers. But suspicion fell on Muslim militants fighting a 6–year-old insurgency against the military-backed government.

Gunmen set off an explosive in the road and then fired on the truck, the independent dailies El Watan and Liberte reported Sunday.

The other attack Friday took place near the town of Boghni in the Kabylie region, about 60 miles east of the capital.

Twenty–seven soldiers were killed.

Residents said Muslim militants set off explosives under a troop transport truck carrying a fresh group of soldiers to replace a unit guarding an important bridge, then sprayed it with gunfire, the residents said on condition of anonymity.

Survey finds female doctors harassed

CHICAGO (AP) — More than one-third of female doctors say they have been sexually harassed, according to a survey that suggests the problem isn't disappearing from the medical profession. Overall, 47.7 percent reported having been targets of gender-based harassment, and 36.9 percent reported having been sexually harassed, researchers said in Monday's issue of the Archives of Internal Medicine, released Sunday.

The 1993-94 nationwide survey did not ask women to specify what behavior they thought constituted harassment, only whether they believed it had occurred.

Younger physicians reported higher rates of sexual harassment than older ones, and medical schools were the most common site, said researchers led by Dr. Erica Frank of Emory University in Atlanta.

"Some may believe that problems of harassment will disappear in time, that they are simply a function of older, sexist physicians still being in practice," the researchers said.

But the data suggest a more complicated picture, they said. While younger women may be more sensitive to harassment than their older colleagues, the survey suggests that harassment may be worsening in schools and "we may be continuing to train physicians in an environment where harassment is common," they said. "Present thought characterizes sexual harassment as primarily a manifestation of power, rather than sexual attraction.

Students complain over inflated long distance phone rates

By Victoria Groves
Collegian Staff

Many students living on campus are upset by the discrepancies between on–campus and off–campus long distance rates provided by AT&T, the University of Massachusetts telecommunications carrier.

Currently, customers living on campus pay $1.80 a minute for long distance calls overseas. Off–campus students pay $.62 a minute by paying a $3 monthly fee. Students on campus pay more than two times this rate — the difference is over 100 percent.

Undergraduate Roque A. Vianna sent a letter to Housing Telecommunications in Whitmore Administration Building earlier this month, but has yet to receive a response.

"I find it hard to comprehend how us, students living on campus, are not offered a similar rate to calls made to the same area and using the same long distance company. Why can't the University negotiate better rates for its campus customers?" Vianna wrote.

A student at the University since 1992, living both on and off campus, Vianna frequently calls relatives in Brazil and noticed the difference in charges when he moved back on campus this year.

"I'm sure many students don't know about this. They just get their bills and pay them. It hurts international students the most," Vianna said.

Both international students and those with relatives overseas are affected by this rate discrepancy.

"I'm not calling [relatives] as much because I can't afford it. Reduced rates are at awkward times," Vianna said.

The current long distance overseas rates for the AT&T ACUS program, in which all on campus student are enrolled, are: from 8–12 a.m. $1.95 a minute, and 12–8 a.m. $1.41 a minute Monday through Sunday. There are no discount rates on weekends or holidays.

Brazil is three hours ahead of United States eastern standard time, so for Vianna, discount rates are hard to take advantage of.

"To take advantage of the reduced rate, I would have to place my calls at 12 a.m. eastern time, 3 a.m. Brazil time, or at 7 a.m. eastern time, 10 a.m. Brazil time... at 3 in the morning people are sleeping, and at 10 in the morning people are busy working. So the discounted rate rarely ever works," Vianna said.

Dennis Bromery, Housing Telecommunications Manager is aware that on campus rates are higher for long distance calls, but said that there are fees that on–campus students don't have to pay because the University owns the phone system.

"On campus you don't pay for monthly phone service, call waiting or installation... it doesn't cost as much to provide dial tone here as it does off campus," Bromery said.

Vianna would rather see a choice between these extra services and the rates that off campus students have access to.

"Maybe they should give us a choice of services or rates... we should be paying the same rates as off campus students. That's the bottom line," Vianna said.

A lowering of rates on campus, Bromery cautions, may result in higher costs elsewhere.

"If we lower rates and then lose money to the University, we have to raise tuition and fees," Bromery said.

There is a bid request proposal in progress for a new long distance billing service. Bromery was hesitant to give details because the proposal is tentative, but long distance services may be invited to bid to gain UMass as a customer if they can provide students with better rates.

"We want to take advantage of lower rates and pass the savings on to customers," Bromery said.

There are complications however, because Housing Telecommunications needs to make sure that if the University does switch carriers, they are capable of handling a phone system this large.

"We need to be sure they can handle us so they don't leave students high and dry. Anything we choose needs to be seamless... but I don't want to say the bid proposal will definitely lower rates," Bromery said.

Any changes in long distance carriers are slated to tentatively occur during the fall 1998 semester.

Leavitt released from jail; Anthrax may be non-fatal

By Dara Akika Tom
Associated Press

LOGANDALE, Nev. — FBI agents searched the home of a researcher again yesterday, even though the man was released from jail after tests showed he possessed a harmless animal vaccine, not a biological weapon.

More than a dozen agents descended on William Leavitt Jr.'s property in this small farming community 50 miles northeast of Las Vegas. Neighbors said the agents had been searching the home and an adjacent shed since Wednesday, when Leavitt was arrested along with Larry Wayne Harris.

Leavitt's lawyer, Lamond Mills, called the search "a fishing expedition" and said he planned to visit the home to "see what kind of shape the house is in and what they've taken."

"I think they're embarrassed, and I think they're looking for anything they can find to bring charges against Bill Leavitt," Mills said.

FBI agents at the scene declined to comment.

The search came on the eve of today's detention hearing for Harris, who remained jailed over the weekend on biological weapon charges.

A government lab on Sunday was still testing material seized from Harris' Ohio home to determine if it is a dangerous — and illegal — biological agent, federal sources have said. Harris is on probation for a 1995 conviction for illegally obtaining the bubonic plague bacteria.

The FBI says its investigation into both men is continuing, even though authorities announced Saturday that a substance once feared to be the ingredients of a biological weapon turned out to be a harmless anthrax vaccine.

The material was seized from Leavitt and Harris on Wednesday in Henderson, Nev., just outside Las Vegas, triggering a nationwide scare. They were arrested on charges of possessing a biological agent for use as a weapon.

Leavitt was released from jail Saturday night on his own recognizance.

Although the anthrax vaccine is legal and safe, the charges were still

EWC hosts open house in new location this afternoon

By Elana Premack
Collegian Correspondent

In celebration of the move to a more accessible location, the Everywoman's Center Resource Room is holding an open house today. The Resource Room, now located on the ground floor of Wilder Hall, will be open from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. for the open house, and from 4–7 p.m. for a reception and entertainment.

In the 26th year of operation, EWC houses a constantly updated database of support groups, and offers access to publications, a legal services book, a job bank and a housing book, as well as a 1,200–volume lending library.

The center makes over 6,000 referrals to social workers throughout western Massachusetts as well as local community members, and provides space for programs such as poetry readings and "Women of Color" events.

"The open house offers an opportunity for the community to get acquainted with the new space and the resources at the center," Carol Wallace, Executive Director of EWC said.

Staff members will also be available to answer any questions.

The Resource Room has been a vital part of EWC since the center's beginning and the project has received much support from EWC's core staff.

Carmen Rolon, director of the Resource Room, Cindy Green, assistant director, Anne Nwokoye, EWC's office manager and Wallace coordinated the move. With assistance from workers at the Physical Plant, the room began its move on Dec. 22, 1997. EWC will recognize the contribution of the workers from 2–4 p.m. today.

Funding was made available for the move after an additional needs request was submitted to Chancellor David K. Scott by student affairs, of which EWC is a part.

"The need for accessible space was the primary reason we received funding," Wallace said. "We have employees and clients in need of accessible space."

The new location makes the Resource Room wheelchair– accessible and provides a handicapped restroom and handicapped parking adjacent to the building.

Wallace also said that the move addressed a number of other needs, including a solution for an overcrowded room.

"It has really become an Everywoman's Center," Green said. "Not just an able–bodied woman's center."

Reserve troops are made ready in case of military strike

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Saddam Hussein

By Jim Abrams
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon started a call–up of Reserves in case they're needed for a military strike against Iraq and the Clinton administration withheld judgment yesterday on whether an agreement announced in Baghdad will be adequate to settle the dispute over weapon inspections.

U.N. Secretary–General Kofi Annan's spokesman in Baghdad, Fred Eckhard, said Iraqi President Saddam Hussein had agreed on a plan to open up presidential sites to inspectors from the United Nations. Diplomats were hoping the agreement would satisfy President Clinton and forestall any military action by the United States.

Clinton spent the afternoon in the Oval Office where he was in touch with security advisers and was constantly being briefed on the situation, said spokesman Joe Lockhart. He said lack of secure telephone service between Washington and Baghdad had kept details of the agreement to a minimum.

White House press secretary Mike McCurry would not assess the preliminary accounts. "We've got a lot of serious questions," McCurry said. "It's a very serious matter at a serious time, and we want to get some questions answered."

Even before the mid–afternoon announcement, Clinton was talking with world leaders about promising signals from the Iraqi capital. Lockhart said he telephoned Sultan Qaboos of Oman and Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain, Clinton's major ally in the Iraq showdown. Lockhart said Clinton and Blair agreed to look closely at the details of any arrangement.

News of the agreement came after Secretary of State Madeleine Albright said the United States will act alone against Iraq if any agreement Annan brings back to New York tomorrow jeopardizes U.S. interests.

"It is possible that he will come with something that we don't like, in which case we will pursue our national interests," Albright said on ABC's "This Week with Sam and Cokie."

She said Saddam's ability to threaten the world with weapons of mass destruction must be diminished, by military means if necessary. "We will pursue that, that's what our job is, that's what we will do," she said.

To emphasize the threat, Defense Secretary William Cohen announced on NBC's "Meet the Press" that he was making the first request for reservists to provide combat support for the 32,000 troops stationed in the Persian Gulf. "We are hoping for a peaceful solution, but we are prepared to exercise a military option if necessary," he said.

pending against the men. Leavitt's attorneys said federal prosecutors should drop the charges. Harris' attorney did not return calls for comment over the weekend.

Leavitt's attorneys contend he had no intention of using the material as a weapon, but was instead planning to use it to test an unorthodox disease-killing machine he was considering buying for $2 million from a man who would become an FBI informant.

That informant, Ronald Rockwell, has said he turned in Leavitt and Harris last week when Leavitt claimed to possess military-grade anthrax, which could kill thousands of people. Leavitt's attorneys said Rockwell is a con artist who double-crossed Leavitt and Harris when the deal to buy the machine turned sour.

Leavitt has a fire safety supply company in Las Vegas and has also been involved in nontraditional research seeking cures for AIDS and multiple sclerosis.

Leavitt's friends said they were relieved that he was released from jail.

Marine Maj. Mary Baldwin at Central Command headquarters in Tampa, Fla., said Cohen is asking Clinton for authority to call about 500 members of the National Guard and Reserve for logistical support. She said they will include an Army chemical company, Air Force special operations C130 air crews, Navy harbor surveillance personnel and a Coast Guard port security unit.

She said the particular units have not been designated. Cohen said that people would be mobilized from various bases.

Administration officials said Annan left for Iraq fully aware that there could be no maneuvering room on the key issues of total access and operational control for U.N. weapons inspectors. The Iraqi proposal of putting a time limit on inspections was unacceptable, they said.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said on ABC that he was "very nervous" about investing any negotiating authority in Annan when it was American lives that would be on the line in a military conflict. "We shouldn't have set up this scenario that the Secretary General of the U.N. is making those decisions," McCain said.

He and other senators said Congress is prepared to approve a resolution of support for military action but only if it includes backing for a long-term plan to end Saddam's ability to menace the world. "We have to be prepared to go the full distance, which is to do everything possible to disrupt his regime and to encourage the forces of democracy," Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., said on ABC.

Both chambers could take up Iraqi resolutions this week. National Security Adviser Sandy Berger, on "Fox News Sunday," repeated the administration position that it would welcome congressional backing, but "I don't think we believe we need it as a legal matter. But, obviously, it would be a preferable way to proceed."

Bill Richardson, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, joined Albright, Cohen and Berger on the Sunday news programs as the administration continued its campaign to convince Americans that military action against Iraq is justified and needed.

Monica Lewinsky's lawyers claim defense fund inadequate

By Pete Yost
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Monica Lewinsky needs a legal defense fund just like the president, her lawyer said yesterday, declaring: "I am not being paid appropriately."

"I would welcome" a responsible law or accounting firm's coming forward to create a fund "like the one that's helping President Clinton out," attorney William Ginsburg said in responding to questions on NBC's "Meet the Press."

While "I'm not looking personally for anybody's sympathy," he said, "I am not being paid appropriately and her father has limited resources."

Ginsburg said Ms. Lewinsky has no current plans to write a book about her Washington experiences but that "a literary effort may be her only choice" ultimately.

A medical malpractice lawyer, Ginsburg has represented doctors in high-profile cases such as the deaths of entertainer Liberace and Loyola-Marymount basketball star Hank Gathers.

Ms. Lewinsky's father, Dr. Bernard Lewinsky, whom Ginsburg has represented for 25 years, has said Whitewater prosecutor Kenneth Starr has spent tens of millions of dollars trying to build a case against the president, "and there's me. Out in the middle of nowhere, I'm supposed to fight this battle. I don't have the means for this sort of cost." Lewinsky spoke Friday night on ABC's "20/20."

In a Sunday appearance on CBS's "Face the Nation," Ginsburg waded into a discussion of the role of longtime presidential confidant Vernon Jordan.

Ginsburg rejected the notion that Ms. Lewinsky got a job offer through Jordan in exchange for denying in the Paula Jones sexual harassment lawsuit that she had a sexual relationship with Clinton.

"Unequivocally no. No quid pro quo," Ginsburg said of a suggestion that Jordan's assistance on a job was a payoff for her denial. Ginsburg said Ms. Lewinsky met with Jordan in early November about help getting a job, a month before her name turned up on a witness list in the Paula Jones case.

But Ginsburg would say nothing about whether Ms. Lewinsky ever told Jordan that she had a sexual relationship with the president. Jordan says Ms. Lewinsky asserted to him that she hadn't.

"I will not and I never have violated the attorney-client privilege, and I cannot talk to you at all about any conversation that she related to me," said Ginsburg.

He also left room for possible involvement by more than one person in referring Ms. Lewinsky to Jordan. Jordan maintained in his only public statement that Ms. Lewinsky was referred to him by Clinton's personal secretary Betty Currie.

"Monica Lewinsky was referred, principally by Betty Currie, to Vernon Jordan," said Ginsburg, leaving the possibility others might have played a role.

Ginsburg's comments came as Clinton loyalists defended the president's rights to refuse to testify if asked in the Lewinsky matter and to invoke executive privilege if he wishes so that Whitewater prosecutors will be unable to delve into conversations with aides about the controversy.

Former Clinton White House counsel Jack Quinn supported the idea of using executive privilege to protect conversations between Clinton and top aide Bruce Lindsey about how to respond to questions from Whitewater prosecutors or from House hearings. Former Bush White House counsel C. Boyden Gray said that would not be a valid use of executive privilege.

Asked whether the president will testify in the Lewinsky matter, former White House lawyer Lanny Davis said, "I don't know the answer to that question. That's a constitutional as well as a legal question. I'm not his lawyer. I'm a friend, and I'm not going to speak for his lawyers."

Former U.S. Attorney Joseph DiGenova, who served in the Reagan administration, said that if the Clinton camp really believes that Starr is out to "get the president," then DiGenova would advise a client in similar circumstances not to testify.

"I'd tell him not to give the testimony and live with the political consequences," said diGenova.

Mass of the Rings ceremony held at Vatican to honor new cardinals

By Candice Hughes
Associated Press

VATICAN CITY — Bestowing simple golden rings on the Roman Catholic Church's newest cardinals yesterday, Pope John Paul II reminded them that their job is more than just electing his successor.

In a special Mass of the Rings, the pontiff exhorted them to look toward Christianity's third millennium, which he called an "occasion of renewal for believers."

The new millennium, he said, should signal "an extraordinary spring-time of hope for ...all humanity."

He told the newest "princes" of the church that cardinals are charged with more than electing a pope. They are also the church's "senate" and his closest pastoral collaborators.

John Paul sees the new millennium as an opportunity for a grassroots rebirth of the Roman Catholic faith worldwide. He speaks of its importance in nearly every public appearance.

Unlike many of his predecessors, who tended to choose cardinals from the ranks of the church bureaucracy and diplomatic corps, John Paul has reached out into its pastoral ranks worldwide.

"Many of them have been bishops," Los Angeles Cardinal Roger Mahoney said of his new colleagues." I think that helps them understand the reality of life in the parishes and dioceses. It helps put them in touch with the people."

Pope John Paul II

The new cardinals, who were elevated on Saturday in an elaborate ceremony in St. Peter's Square, come from 13 countries, including Tanzania and Brazil.

The pope named 22 new cardinals, but three did not attend the ceremonies. One Italian cardinal was in hospital and the identities of two new cardinals remains a secret, most likely for political reasons. Vatican observers say they may be from China or Vietnam, where the church is suppressed.

At one point in the ceremony, Italian Cardinal Francesco Colasuonno, 73, realized the ring the pope was giving him was too tight.

Colasuonno, the pope's envoy to Italy and formerly a key envoy for the Vatican in the former East bloc, looked up as if in panic at a papal aide. Then the pope and the new cardinal exchanged smiles, and Colasuonno kept the ring in his hand until a bigger one could be found.

Three of the new cardinals are from North America: Chicago Archbishop Francis Eugene George, former Denver Archbishop J. Francis Stafford, now head of the Vatican council on the laity, and Toronto Archbishop Aloysius M. Ambrozic.

The appointments give the United States a record 11 cardinals eligible to vote for a new pope.

Like the pontiff, most of the new cardinals are by-the book conservatives. John Paul has now named 106 — or 86 percent — of the 123 cardinals eligible to choose his successor. Only cardinals under age 80 may vote for pope.

Gerry Adams questions value of talks

By Shawn Pogatchnik
Associated Press

BELFAST, Northern Ireland — The IRA-allied Sinn Fein party denounced Northern Ireland's peace talks as "fundamentally flawed" yesterday and called for a speedy meeting with British Prime Minister Tony Blair.

Sinn Fein's demands came hours before the Belfast talks resume without the party, which has been ejected for two weeks as punishment for two killings blamed on the Irish Republican Army. The IRA's adherence to a 7-month-old truce is the key condition for Sinn Fein's eligibility.

The British and Irish governments, which co-sponsor the talks, say Sinn Fein can return March 9 if the IRA is not implicated in further violence. Participants are supposed to agree on how to govern Northern Ireland by May.

Sinn Fein leader Gerry Adams emphasized he expects Blair to meet him during the party's two-week expulsion, otherwise Sinn Fein might not return to negotiations that lacked what he called "credibility."

Gerry Kelly, a Sinn Fein negotiator best known for his IRA career as a car bomber and prison escape mastermind, told about 1,000 subdued supporters in front of Belfast City Hall that the party would be "as tactical as we've always been" in judging whether to rejoin the talks.

"These talks remain fundamentally flawed, and the two governments must act urgently to rectify that situation," Kelly said, accusing them of caving in to intimidation by Northern Ireland's main pro-British Protestant party, the Ulster Unionists. Hours before Sinn Fein's rally, Protestant congregations gathered at their bomb-damaged churches in Moira, where an explosion wrecked the town's police station and surrounding homes and businesses Friday night, hours after Sinn Fein was expelled. No group has claimed responsibility for leaving the 500-pound car bomb in the mostly Protestant town 20 miles southwest of Belfast.

Annan's U.N. deal may avoid U.S. air attack on Iraq, Hussein

By Robert H. Reid
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — In a breakthrough that could avert a U.S.-led attack on Iraq, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan struck a deal yesterday with Saddam Hussein on the core issue of the 4 1/2-month Iraqi crisis: opening Saddam's presidential compounds to U.N. arms inspectors.

U.N. and Iraqi officials provided few details of the accord, which the United States still has not approved.

Annan's spokesman, Fred Eckhard, said it assured the rights of U.N. inspectors and didn't include a time limit on inspections. The United States had vigorously opposed such a limit, and agreement on that point reportedly was clinched only when Annan met Saddam for three hours yesterday afternoon.

Eckhard said he expected the deal would fly with the United States and other U.N. Security Council members. U.S. officials said they didn't have a full text of the accord and still had "serious questions."

Nevertheless, Annan and Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz scheduled a ceremony at 10:30 a.m. (2:30 a.m. EST) today to sign the deal, which Annan will present Tuesday to the Security Council. An accord endorsed by the Security Council would save Iraq from a punishing U.S. air attack, and save Washington from strong international opposition to such a strike. It would also be a triumph for Annan — if the Iraqis hold to the bargain.

Annan's deal-making meeting with Saddam took place on the third day of his visit, at the Republican Palace, one of eight presidential sites that Iraq had declared off-limits to U.N. weapons inspectors.

"We've reached an agreement," Eckhard said. "We have a text."

One Iraqi official, who also insisted his named not be used, was asked whether there was a deal. He replied, "Yes."

Eckhard said, "We expect the text will be acceptable to all 15 members of the Security Council," including the United States, which has said it would refuse an agreement that it believes undermines the inspectors' authority.

Annan and his eight-member team negotiated with Iraqi officials around the clock Saturday in a series of meetings that ended at 2 a.m. The talks resumed later Sunday morning at the Iraqi Foreign Ministry. After that, Annan met Saddam.

Later, as Annan returned to the pink stucco villa where he is staying, reporters asked whether a deal had been reached. He did not comment, but an aide, Ahmed Fawzi, flashed a V-for-victory sign.

Albright could not make a judgment about the accord because she did not receive a "comprehensive assessment" from Annan, Rubin said.

The crisis over weapons inspections has brought the Persian Gulf to the brink of war. The United States has sent a naval armada and 25,000 troops to the region to mount air strikes unless Iraq agrees to open all sites, including presidential palaces, to the weapons inspectors.

Pro-Iraq protests have erupted across the Arab world — Jordan had to send out tanks Sunday in one desert city to contain them — and sent Israelis scurrying for gas masks and diplomats there preparing to leave. Israel also decided Sunday to distribute antibiotics to protect against a biological attack, despite Annan's news.

Britain, America's strongest backer for a military strike, reacted cautiously.

"The expectation is that Kofi Annan will make an announcement in the morning whether a deal has been brokered," a spokesman for Prime Minister Tony Blair said on customary anonymity. "Even then, he will report back to the Security Council the details of that." France took some credit for the U.N. chief's deal, saying Paris "constantly defended the idea of a diplomatic solution." "France welcomes the announcement made in Baghdad and hopes that the accord will respond to expectations," the Foreign Ministry said in a statement.

The U.N. inspectors are trying to determine if Iraq has complied with U.N. orders, issued at the end of the 1991 Persian Gulf War, to destroy all long-range missiles and weapons of mass destruction. That conditon must be met before U.N. economic sanctions can be lifted.

Before the announcement, British Foreign Secretary Robin Cook said in London that the United Nations could consider lifting the sanctions if Saddam gives Annan a written promise to comply with the inspections.

"If he would comply... and if he really is willing this time to cooperate and not continue to deceive and delay, that (lifting the sanctions) could be done in the fairly near future," Cook said on British Broadcasting Corp. radio.

Television footage showed Annan greeting Saddam, who was dressed in a dark, double-breasted suit, and Aziz, who wore a military uniform.

White House spokesman Mike McCurry said preliminary accounts had been received from Baghdad, but he refused to assess them. "We've got a lot of serious questions. It's a very serious matter at a serious time, and we want to get some questions answered," he said.

U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright had "a short phone briefing" with Annan on Sunday, and then began her own consultations with the French and British foreign ministers, her spokesman James P. Rubin said.

India's elections rocked by violence

By Ranjan Roy
Associated Press

NEW DELHI, India — Bloody political clashes marred voting Sunday in India's parliamentary elections, which took place amid another distraction — the sudden collapse of the government in the country's largest state.

Twelve people were killed in factional violence. Nearly 40 others were injured across the nine states that voted.

The turnout was 55 percent — slightly below average — on the second day of a six-day election, which completed voting for three-fourths of the 543 districts at stake. More than 600 million Indians are eligible to vote.

By Saturday, all but a few votes will be in, and ballot counting begins March 2.

Most deaths Sunday were reported from the eastern state of Bihar, where 20 people were killed in the first round of voting Feb. 16.

Gunmen shot and killed a communist supporter inside a polling booth. Seven other people were killed in shootouts between rival gangs fighting for control of polling booths in different parts of the state. One person caught stuffing bogus ballot papers was beaten to death with sticks by activists of a rival political group.

"It is this democracy? Whoever has more activists around a booth captures and prevents genuine voters," said Mohammad Idris, of Hajipur town in Bihar, who was turned back by political activists who said his vote had already been cast.

In the neighboring state of Orissa, one policeman was killed when leftist guerrillas attacked a security car carrying guards. Two people died in West Bengal state.

Widespread rigging of votes also was reported, forcing election authorities to suspend polling in several booths.

More than 550 political activists, including two state government ministers, were arrested on charges of disrupting elections.

"People are tired of elections. They have come too soon," said Madhukar Gawli, a voter in western Nagpur. The elections are the second in less than three years — a result of inconclusive results from the 1996 vote.

As the voting proceeded, the country's attention was drawn to Uttar Pradesh, the largest state, where the government was suddenly toppled overnight.

Satisfied with progress, kidnappers release one U.N. military observer

By Misha Dzhindzhikhashvili
Associated Press

TBILISI, Georgia — The kidnappers of four U.N. military observers released one of their hostages yesterday in a goodwill gesture and predicted a satisfactory end to the standoff through negotiations.

The freed hostage, Capt. Julio Navas of Uruguay, was shown on Georgian television getting in a car and being driven away by U.N. officials near the western village of Dzhikhaskari, where the other hostages are being held.

"We are satisfied with the talks, and that is why we released one of the hostages," Zurab Shoniya, one of the kidnappers' leaders, said on Georgian television.

Another kidnapper, Gocha Esebua, speaking from the house where the captives were held, said, "I think it will end successfully." The kidnappers, supporters of former Georgian President Zviad Gamsakhurdia, have offered to release the hostages, taken Thursday, only if the government freed unspecified "political prisoners" associated with their cause.

Shoniya said Saturday that the prisoners did not include seven men, described as Gamsakhurdia followers, who were arrested on charges of attempting to assassinate Georgian President Eduard Shevardnadze on Feb. 9. Two bodyguards and one of the assailants was killed in the assault, but Shevardnadze emerged unharmed. The president has said he believes the assassination attempt and kidnappings are linked.

Gamsakhurdia followers strongly oppose Shevardnadze, whose election followed the armed coup that overthrew Gamsakhurdia in 1992. Gamsakhurdia later died.

Esebua told Georgian television yesterday that in addition to earlier demands, his group now wanted the negotiations to include Nemo Burchuladze, a former deputy chairman of Supreme Soviet of Georgia believed to be living in Russia.

The University of Massachusetts administration finally came to its senses and agreed to call in an outside mediator to solve the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) contract dispute last week. However, will this be just another administration tactic to delay settlement or are they actually focused on resolving the issue once and for all? The clock is ticking and it is the students of UMass who are suffering.

"How will our University develop to its full potential when Campaign UMass brings in a record–breaking $40 million (as it did last year), yet funds cannot be set aside for one of the school's most important functions?"

After working without a contract for two years, GEO's next contract is supposed to be under negotiation beginning next month. In other words, their old contract is about to expire before it is even settled. How is the University supposed to bring quality graduate students onto the Amherst campus when it isn't willing to even provide a financially secure working environment?

Without the prospect of a reasonable contract, why would quality graduate students come to UMass? These are the people who are teaching a large number of the general education requirements that are, in theory, at the heart of a UMass education. UMass needs to draw the best.

The University has come a long way since President Bulger took the reigns and began the process of improving our school. But how will our University develop to its full potential when Campaign UMass brings in a record–breaking $40 million (as it did last year), yet funds cannot be set aside for one of the school's most important functions?

The GEO contract is not merely an issue of labor, but one of education. Graduate students are not merely employees, but teachers and students as well. Their demands are not unreasonable and will only provide for better working and learning environments.

Sitting down at a table is a start, however, real progress will not be made until the dispute is settled. For settlement, the administration must make concessions. Settle the contract and move on with the educational process — that is the reason why we are all here.

Deferred priorities

"Deferred maintenance" may be the buzz–words of the University of Massachusetts community these days, but dilapidated buildings are nothing new to this college senior.

Freshman year, my third week of school, on my birthday of all days, late September rains began to fall inside my 22nd floor room in George Washington Tower. A minor inconvenience, nothing a little spackle won't fix — or so I thought.

Laura Stock

After conversations with my residential assistant and dorm maintenance staff, I was informed the University had placed me and several other floormates in condemned rooms. That edifice — side of Washington tower required a new roof, and repairs wouldn't be made until the following summer break.

They knew this beforehand, but assigned seven of us to the condemned rooms anyway.

I was actually willing to live among strategically–placed buckets of water and droplets of curiously bubbling ceiling plaster just to preserve the new friendships I'd made on my floor. I begged my RA not to move me and separate me from my roommate. After all, I was living on a special Talent Advancement Program (TAP) floor with other freshmen in my major; we had classes together, a peer mentor on our floor and a veritable support system for fledgling first–years.

To my dismay, the RA showed me pictures of the fiberglass piping and indoor drainage system the room's inhabitants had rigged up the previous year and the Director of Housing phoned me personally to tell me I had to move. It was a health hazard to live there, and of course the University had to protect itself from lawsuits — even though they were the ones who put me there in the first place.

My experience is only a microcosm of the tortured state of the buildings on this campus. At the Faculty Senate meeting last Thursday, Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance, Paul Page and Director of Facilities Planning, James Cahill revealed the results of an audit of all campus buildings which estimated the repair bill at a whopping $393 million.

The longer the University puts off making repairs as they arise, the more money it costs us in the long run. In fact, Page and Cahill said unless the campus increases its spending for deferred maintenance by $15 million in the next 20 years, the nearly $400 million price projected cost of repair is so high, the University is also considering demolishing buildings and putting new ones in their place to save money.

UMass is going to pay a very dear price for procrastination, and it won't only be in dollars and cents.

In order to allocate monies towards the direly needed building repairs, Chancellor David K. Scott has stripped funds used to hire faculty. Specifically, the "early retirement proposal" contained in Scott's Strategic Action Plan calls for retirement of 400 faculty between 1996–98, with only 50 percent of those positions to be re–hired. A total loss of 1,000 faculty and staff members is projected by the year 2000.

According to Scott's plan, UMass will have some pretty nice looking lecture halls with no professors at their podiums. On the other hand, some buildings are so bad faculty are having a hard time adequately conducting classes. It's a chicken–or–the–egg debate, and either way we students have the most to lose.

Unfortunately, the University has very few options here. It can apply for funding through state bonds, the UMass Building Authority, or its own operating budget — translation: increase tuition. Renovated, but empty classrooms. University officials can petition state legislators and the governor for support — but with a capital spending cap in Massachusetts practically exceeded by the "Big Dig" debacle in downtown Boston, money from the Bay State isn't likely. But some solution has to be obtained, somehow.

Until we do this, demands made of the administration such as those last spring following the Goodell Takeover have to be forced to the back burner. The University cannot increase the percentage of minority professors or diverse programs on campus if it cannot hire any professors.

"UMass is going to pay a very dear price for procrastination, and it won't only be in dollars and cents."

UMass is going to pay in the long run, whether it be through tuition hikes, faculty loss or just dealing with the damaged buildings. Just like I was willing to live in a leaky room freshman year, I am certainly willing to sit in an ugly lecture hall, in a chair with broken springs and no table to write on — if it means retaining and hiring professors who will give me the quality education I expect from UMass.

A lesson in bigotry

Paul Hayes

It's been four–and–a–half years since that warm, muggy September evening, during the first week of my freshman year in 1993. I hadn't yet unpacked my I.O.U. sweatshirts, I hadn't yet been to Hobart, I still thought Eddie Vedder was a god. My room on the fourth floor of Pierpont was airless, and the walls were sweating, so I went out onto the corner balcony that faces Cance to cool off. Out there I heard the sounds of violence emanate from in front of the Hampden Dining Hall. It was the sound of a race riot. The noise bounced off the various low rise and tower dorms so that it seemed to be coming from all directions, in echoes which — like the whole issue of race itself — disoriented and confused my senses.

Since that day, race has continued to be an issue I cannot seem to figure out, but one which I feel I am coming to understand. You might expect someone to come to UMass a bigot, but it appears I may leave one, and strangely enough, that may be a good thing.

During the pre–UMass days I spent in my hometown, the suburban bastion of whiteness that is Woburn, I'd guess I came into contact with about ten different black people in 18 years of living. My whole sense of who blacks were (as if they were all of one mind) was severely skewed. My only exposure to them (notice the polar opposition I set up) came from books and newspapers, TV, and rap music.

The latter of these probably served as my greatest influence, particularly artists such as Ice Cube and Public Enemy. I was an angry young kid, and I felt an affinity with the rage that came through on albums such as "It Takes a Nation of Millions to Hold Us Back" and "EazyEKKa's Most Wanted." As a result, I began to see the whole black race as people who were going through the same sorts of things I was. And as a budding writer, how could I not root for the free speech rights of Ice–T and the 2 Live Crew?

But it's not like I wasn't a white suburban kid. My friends and I used to all tell those black jokes that begin with "Why do...?" and "What's the difference between...?" But around the time I was in junior high I stopped laughing at them, I stopped telling them. After that, one friend of mine would always follow such a joke by saying in a mocking tone "Oh wait, don't say those jokes around Hayes, cause he loves black people." I used to just tell him he was ignorant, but maybe what he said betrayed an ignorance in myself.

I see now that I had become a liberal in the worst way. I became the patronizing liberal Cornel West describes in this excerpt from his book "Race Matters:"

"[F]or [white] liberals, black people are to be "included" and "integrated" into "our" society and culture; [an approach] which fails to see that the presence and predicaments of black people are neither additions to nor deflections from American life, but rather constitutive elements of that life."

In time I recognized my friend was saying, even if it wasn't what he intended to say, when he mocked me:

Hayes loves black people.

Hayes treats blacks differently based on the color of their skin.

Hayes is a bigot.

This wasn't something I recognized overnight. I was still patronizing and condescending my whole freshman year. I read race into a lot of issues. When a black kid got mad at a white kid for playing Dr. Dre's "The Chronic," because of the album's liberal use of the word "nigger," I felt compelled to side with the black kid because I let race dictate the issue. When groups on campus attacked the Minuteman mascot as a racist "white man with a gun," I felt compelled to agree.

Then during my sophomore year, I was given an assignment by my college writing teacher: go to an event where you are not part of the majority and write about it. "This is gonna be easy," I said. "No sweat."

A couple of days later, in the 11th hour before the assignment was due, I set out across campus from Southwest to the New Africa House to see some sort of art exhibition there. During the walk I was thinking about ways I could write this assignment before class, and I walked faster to make up some time.

But then when I saw my destination come into view, a part of me froze up. I hadn't expected this. My liberal views suddenly seemed far away. I paced in front of the building for a couple of minutes before going inside. When I looked into a black face to ask about the exhibit, my eyes might have twitched slightly. Maybe out of discomfort. Public Enemy hadn't prepared me for this.

I was told that the exhibit was closed, and I walked out feeling a sense of relief of which I felt terribly ashamed. I wiped my sweating palms off in disgust.

Now, I try to look people in the eye, I try to talk to them, not who I might assume them to be. Yet I sometimes look away in conversation, attach stigma to people. –But after graduation, I won't return home the same Woburnite I left as. Maybe there's hope for me, and the white suburbs, yet.

Women's Hockey in Nagano & Amherst

To the editor:

I commend Casey Kane on writing the article "U.S. Women Bring Focus to Olympics" (Feb. 9). Like Casey, I think it is great that more women are involved, and allowed to be involved, in sports, especially ice hockey. I also appreciate the coverage the U.S. Olympic Hockey team is getting by both news programs and the Collegian.

However, Casey does not need to look as far as Nagano, Japan to find courageous women breaking into the world of hockey. The UMass Women's Ice Hockey Club Team has been a part of the university for the past five years with this year being its best with a winning record of 7–1. With women's hockey in the Olympics, this is an ideal time for the Collegian to cover the UMass women's hockey games as well as for the University to begin supporting this club team rather than trying to crush it.

The primary excuse for preventing the team from going varsity is funding, but if twenty–five University women can fund this team, I certainly think that the Athletic Department can figure out how to do it too. I am asking you, the Collegian and members of the UMass community, not only to show support for the women making hockey history in Nagano, but also those who attend your school and are struggling to make history here at UMass.

Rush to war is sickening

To the editor:

To the old adage about the inevitability of death and taxes, must we now include war against Iraq? It appears the path to combat, per usual, is developing an inexorable momentum. The combination of superior firepower, soaring popularity at home and an agreed–upon arch–villain in Saddam Hussein makes war appear low–risk.

But I find the rush to war sickening. Why doesn't the U.S. media publicize the one million Iraqi deaths brought from the aftermath of Desert Storm and the crippling U.N. economic sanctions? Is it that emaciated children are not photogenic? Do pricks of conscience fail to increase viewer ratings and newspaper sales?

As in the Vietnam War, American pilots — and the patriotic hordes who support them — are estranged from the actual devastation our bombs engender. Instead it is sold as a type of laser surgery: only the "bad" parts will be destroyed. But because Saddam Hussein is so easy to vilify, the entire country which he heads becomes the new "evil empire" by extension; therefore, destroy it all and, of course, feel good about it.

And unless there is an unprecedented popular groundswell here opposed to the war, it will soon be coming to a TV near you. If it's not clear what the fighting will achieve, how many are killed or why we're fighting at all, push these concerns aside. Enjoy the special effects. The government censors will only allow visuals that won't disturb you.

Indifference helps injustice continue

To the editor:

Michael Messaros' column ("Mumia–fever," Feb. 19) quoted a flyer which used the word "righteous" to describe the death of Officer Faulkner [who Abu–Jamal has been convicted of killing]. The full quote was that Mumia Abu– Jamal was framed for "the righteous 1981 killing of a Philly cop engaged in an act of police brutality." The organizations responsible for this flyer, including Friends of RAIL (Revolutionary Anti–Imperialist League), do not advocate killing cops, but they do advocate self–defense against police brutality. A mountain of evidence strongly suggests that Mumia is innocent. Elsewhere in the editorial, Messaros admits to having researched the question and having doubts about Mumia's guilt, as many people do. In legal terms, this translates into reasonable doubt, which is supposed to result in the acquittal of a defendant.

Messaros calls for carefully examining the facts before deciding one's opinion on the issue. Well, presenting facts about the issue is exactly what we were attempting to do; the flyer in question advertised the March 4 presentation of a BBC documentary on Mumia's case.

Messaros states that there are many others on death row whose guilt is questionable, but are unfortunately getting less attention. We agree. That is why we are organizing for Jericho '98, on March 27 in Washington, D.C., to raise awareness about the over 150 political prisoners serving time in U.S. prisons.

Overall, Messaros' editorial is demonstrative of our generation's apathy for social and political issues. He exemplifies our generation's stereotype in saying "Don't tell me about it. Set up a booth at Lollapalooza." The issues of racism, police brutality and wrongful imprisonment of political dissidents are underpowered – yet Messaros shows disdain for efforts to raise awareness of these issues. Unfortunately, many of our generation deem these, and other similar social problems, to be irrelevant to their lives. Now is the time for the youth of today to take a stand with Jericho '98.

Thank you, UMass!

To the editor:

My foster son, Ensenio, and I have just completed four days of fundraising in the Campus Center Concourse toward a Costa Rica Rainforest Study Trip.

I would like to thank and honor all the wonderful contacts and the expressions of support extended to us in the process.

There were some individuals whose efforts and collaboration made the whole thing possible. Elizabeth Dale, Director of the Campus Center, gave receptivity, informative direction and encouragement from the start. The Student Union Commission, lead by Zoe Camara, gave consent and gracious coordination. AHORA, the organization of Latino students, and its president, Roxanne Torres, were warmly enthusiastic to our activities.

GUSTER / SAMEASYOU
Student Union Ballroom
Feb. 20

Two Boston–area groups, Guster and Sameasyou, teamed up for a truly enjoyable show at the Student Union Ballroom last Friday night.

Sameasyou started the evening off with several songs from their debut CD, Listen... released this past September by Reverse Curve Records. Listen... features 10 songs written by vocalist and Berklee College of Music student Patrick Yerby.

Sameasyou pleased the audience with their cheerful pop– sound and energy, a bit of a mix between Ben Folds Five and Phish. The five–man group's "Montana" and "Mosquitos & Fireflies part 1" stood out, explaining why Sameasyou was nominated for a Boston Music Award for "Outstanding New Rock Act on an Indie Label."

Drummer Thomas Gordon took the mic to deliver an unforgettable cover of "Love Shack." Gordon's powerful voice and perfect timing got the 300 audience members moving and singing along.

After a brief intermission, Guster, the "Best Live Act" of the 1997 Boston Music Awards, took the stage to enthrall the audience for an hour and a half.

The three–man group, featuring two acoustic guitars and a set of bongos and congas, drew the crowd in with their melodious vocal harmonies and strong emotion.

Guster played several songs from its most recent album, Goldfly, which was named the "Independent Record of the Year" at the 1998 Boston Music Awards.

Vocalists Ryan Miller and Adam Gardner delivered great soulful sound in "X–Ray Eyes" and "Rocket Ship."

"Medicine" was perhaps the most memorable tune of the night, featuring Miller and Gardner's manipulation of the strings.

Brian Rosenworcel's exploits on the bongos also thrilled the crowd, and contributed much to the band's distinctive sound.

The group, which formed in 1992 at Tufts University, also played some tracks off its debut album, Parachute, which was named "Best Local Debut Album" in 1995 by The Boston Globe.

Michael Keck's one–man show is a unique exploration of violence

VOICES IN THE RAIN: THE STRUGGLE FOR SURVIVAL AND HOPE
Bowker Auditorium
Feb. 20

Last Friday night in Bowker Auditorium the energetic young actor, Michael Keck, performed his one–man show, Voices in the Rain: The Struggle for Survival and Hope, a piece dealing with the intricacies of violence and incarceration in America today.

Keck's show, a "mixed media performance thang," was a full hour and a half of different characters' stories juxtaposed with music, sound and images. The images, projected onto two huge screens positioned behind Keck, ranged from pictures of young children to images of bar codes, American flags and inner–city scenes. The sound was an intense mix of drum beats, rap and everyday noises, like police sirens and car alarms. Keck incorporated all of this within his various vignettes of everyday life in Black America.

His characters, a mixture of convicts, young African–American men and abused children, all expressed a similar sentiment: the difficulty in struggling to survive in violent communities.

In the United States, there are more men of color in prison than in schools or universities. Keck feels that there is a direct correlation between family violence and incarceration. Victims of family violence have a high likelihood of going to prison, a place that Keck believes "intensifies the tendency towards violence." Unfortunately, Keck admits, for many young men today, prison life is an improvement from that on the street or in the home.

Keck's originality in text often comes from incidents in his own life. In a short discussion after the performance, Keck told the audience that he has been wrongfully arrested almost a dozen times because he matched the description of a criminal. His opening sketch, a scene in which a young man hears someone breaking into his house and calls 911, is from one of those experiences. The scene is based on an actual event in which Keck heard some one breaking into his parents' home in the middle of the night. Keck rushed to the kitchen to call the police, and flashed the lights to scare off the burglar. When he heard the police pull up he went outside to meet them, and he was arrested on the spot, having been mistaken for the perpetrator.

Along with experiences of his own, Voices in the Rain also contains the stories of various inmates that Keck interviewed. Keck found that roughly "eight out of ten of the men I talked to had no interest in schooling whatsoever, and had been abused in the home." The many characters that Keck portrayed who were convicts often seemed to prefer prison to the outside world. One of his personalities joked, "There's order in prison, and you always dine on time."

Although the show is an enthralling multimedia event, Michael Keck doesn't perform it regularly. The first performance of Voices in the Rain was in July of 1996, through Minneapolis' Illusion Theater, directed by Kent Stephens. Keck and his crew have since taken their show to Virginia, New Orleans and Pennsylvania. But Keck explains that they have never received any grants for the show, so he will perform it once somewhere, and then has to go home and get a "real job" for a while. When he has the money and the energy, he and his stage crew collaborate and take the show for another run.

What does Keck with to achieve with Voices in the Rain? "I hope this production will stimulate a community dialogue that examines the solutions to the problems of violence within our communities."

Michael Keck is a recipient of both the Oppenheimer and American Critics Awards for his music and creativity in other dramatic works.

Students shine in Umoja Talent Show

By Edgar A. Barros
Collegian Staff

In celebration of Black History Month, Iota Phi Theta Fraternity, Inc., Beta-Beta Chapter held its fifth annual Umoja Talent Show at the Campus Center Auditorium.

A total of 15 acts were present. Contestants included students from the University of Massachusetts, the Five College area and the Springfield area.

The talent show provided the audience with a variety of diverse performances which included dance groups, singers, poets, rap groups and a reggae artist.

The event was hosted by Voy Fernandes, a UMass student, and Dub of Ugli Kids (rap group).

The talent show had a panel of 11 judges: Melvin Rodriguez, Monique De La Oz, Nelson Acosta, Renee Lopez, Nam Global, Dolly Fernandes, Craig Buchanan, Christine Warner, Donovan Robinson, Yuland Daley and M. Ricardo Townes.

> "Everybody had a good time and we had no security problems. It was a successful event and we hope that everybody comes out again next year."
> - Jose Corporan, Iota Phi Beta

Contestants were judged on showmanship, appearance and originality. Each category of performance was rated on a scale of one to five, with five being the highest.

Each act was allotted a maximum of seven minutes of stage time. Any performance which exceeded the time limit was penalized one point from each category for every minute over the time limit.

The competition ended with three winners. First place was won by four female students from UMass: Allana E. Todman, Shirley Bruno, Tanya Allen and April Andrews, collectively known as "Premium." The first place quartet brought home the prize of $400 for their efforts.

Second place went to Stephanie Hope, a UMass student/poet. She was awarded $200.

Third place went to singer Toria Wise, a UMass graduate student. She won $100.

The audience was composed of students from virtually every background and race, including African-Americans, Africans, Haitians, Latinos, Asians, European-Americans and Caribbean-Americans.

"Everybody had a good time and we had no security problems. It was a successful event and we hope that everybody comes out again next year," Jose Corporan, a member of Iota Phi Theta, said.

"I enjoyed the show as a whole," freshman Anita Monteiro reflected on the evening's festivities. "But in particular I really enjoyed the performances by singer Letitiah Etheridge, the dance group C.P., and rap artists Evil Doers."

Freshman Hydn Vales, also enjoyed the show. "I give a lot of credit to everybody who went up there and performed because it's tough getting up there on stage in front of a big crowd."

A party was held afterwards at the Malcolm X Cultural Center in the Southwest area of campus.

"The after party was great," Corporan said.

"We had a packed house, and everybody had a good time. As long as there are no flights at our events, I'm a happy camper."

Birth of a new sound

Going beyond the boundaries of tedious R&B and commercial hip-hop, a breakthrough of a new sound in music has finally found its way to the music charts and radio stations. Artists like Erykah Badu, Maxwell and Eric Benet are refining black music and song in what some call "alternative" R&B and others call "neo-classic soul."

The years 1996 and 1997 were, unfortunately, branded by oversexed singers and overpaid rappers more concerned with singing about driving a Mercedes-Benz and wearing Versace clothing rather than expressing true lyrical skills and musical dexterity. However, while the craze for nostalgic 80's beats developed, the desire to hear a different sound rose as well.

Reminiscent of legendary singers like Billie Holiday, Marvin Gaye and Roberta Flack, a return to soul/jazz is now the new hype.

Shirley Bruno

Neo-soul has been attempting to create a new vibe of music for some time now, but struggled through artists like Digable Planets, Mimi Condition and even D'Angelo, who all tried to integrate different genres into mainstream R&B and hip hop. Yet with the release of Erykah Badu's first album, "Baduism," acting as a catalyst for the growing attention towards this flow of creativity, the music audience seems to be sitting on the edge of their seats waiting for the promise that deeper music is bringing to the market.

Now there is an entire army of new artists having the guts to show their love for music and taking the initiative to put something of substance on the market. They are stepping away from the "booty-this-and-freak-me-baby-ag ainst-me" trend to conjure an eclectic sound of creativity, bringing back the richness of soul and blues with the authenticity of live bands. They are mixing in funk with poetry, cellos with snares, and food for thought with visions of love. Appealing to both the younger and older generations, as well as different cultures, they still maintain their versatility and freshness.

The best part is that these artists are comparable only because they operate on a similar level, not because they look or sound alike. Each style is distinctive, each voice is unique and every individual image is bona fide. Just the intonation of their bohemian voices is stirring and infectious anticipation for this new sound.

The birth of neo-soul is a timely, refreshing change of pace and a much needed antidote for those of us who are disappointed with the monotonous direction R&B is driving toward. It is nearly impossible not to hear the rumble from soul artists like Dionne Farris, Groove Theory, Common Sense, Me'Shell NedegeCello, Adriana Evans, The Roots and others who deserve a closer, more intimate look from the public eye.

I only wonder whether neo-soul is here to stay or just a phase with a short life expectancy. After all, it has reared its head many times before with marginal success. Well, perhaps neither the industry nor the public were ready then, but now the redecoration of music seems inevitable and these performers definitely have enough talent to establish themselves in the changing world of music. In a process similar to the separation of alternative from rock, neo-soul is producing a new angle for black music and its culture.

This new class of music sustenance is one which is long overdue. Considering that these raw talents are now stepping up to the mic hard, it seems fitting to let this soul, in the words of Maxwell, "keep rockin' 'til the cops come knockin'."

Shirley Bruno is a UMass student.

Labeled black and white in America

One is labeled a man of no intelligence and must cheat his way out of many opposing obstacles. The other is a man with knowledge superior to all. One of these men is missing the qualities needed to make him a man of high stature, and the other is already a symbol of great prestige. One man has been created to be a burden of society and the other is the savior of the environment in which the first man has corrupted.

Unfortunately these men have been labeled by society according the color of their skin. In the eyes of many, race defines the character and identity of these people. Many follow a belief that in no way are these two men alike. However, both men share much of the same heritage and background, therefore this belief is contradictory.

> When most people picture a black man, they automatically see him as a statistic of the lower class. They see a man less fortunate in life.
> Dammon McLaren

These men are representatives of two races struggling to coexist in a society which has upheld many unequal beliefs during its years.

Today's society is built on a foundation of separation due to many differences, one of them being race. Based on the first impressions of many people, race plays a major role when trying to decide what type of lifestyle a person lives. There are many characteristics about a person which can cause him or her to be stereotyped by his or her peers, but it is a shame that after so many years our society is still stereotyping people. Many people in society still judge people by the color of their skin instead of the individuality of the person. This is when the labeling process takes action. Who is rich and who is poor? Who is strong and who is weak? Who is smart, who is dumb? Who does honest work for a living and who sells drugs for a living?

Although it may not be right, most of us make these types of judgments without really giving it any thought. This is a societal habit which originated hundreds of years before our time. With the formation of these evil habits also came our image of how the ideal man should appear and how he should carry himself.

When most people picture a white man, they envision a well-educated man with a well-paying job. They see a man who walks through the park with his family and takes them on family outings such as picnics. They also picture him having a closet overflowing with expensive suits. His casual dress consists of light brown Dockers along with moccasins and a white dress shirt with the sleeves rolled up to "flash" his new Rolex watch.

When most people picture a black man, they automatically see him as a statistic of the lower class. They see a man less fortunate in life. His picnics are replaced by long hard hours of work for minimum wage. His walks to the park are instead walks to the street corner in order to provide the neighborhood drug addicts with the supplies needed to fulfill their habits. His Dockers are instead baggy jeans and rugged hiking boots.

Unfortunately, these stereotypes sometimes cannot be changed because this is how many perceive the two men, due to the events that have taken place in our country's history and their upbringing.

A few hundred years ago, America was not a powerful economic country. This home of liberty and freedom was once the home of shackles and chains. Slavery plagued the land due to a starving civilization eager to build and expand. However, the enslaved weren't just any and all people, these were men and women of a race viewed (stereotyped) as subordinate because of the color of their skin.

In the mist of all this racial tension, the people of America are still divided, allowing one race to be the dominant to the other. Stemming from this is the stereotyping that takes place in today's society. Our country's history of discrimination and separation is the major cause of the stereotyping which takes place today. By studying history, we see that America is a country that is full of racial separation, superiority and inferiority between different races, discrimination and hate.

Millions of people in America who are considered white, in actuality, are not "white." If a new method of categorizing race was devised, millions of black people would not be "black." As a matter of fact, we are all black and we are all white. Of course no two people are the same, but we should all view ourselves as equals. Since race is a label that lessens equality in today's society, we have to come to grips with the fact that most of us share the same heritage and come from similar backgrounds. We can all realize the fact that we are all equal. These labels of color and ethnic background are just stereotypes which perpetrate the separate of human kind instead of bringing us together as one.

By ridding our society of these labels, we can acknowledge the fact that we are one, which makes it much easier for us to coexist on earth as the human race.

Dammon McLaren is a UMass student.

An image of black men

The image of the black male-dominating American mainstream culture has, in essence, become a monolithic art form.

Time and time again, we see and hear strong black males blatantly wearing their masculinity on their sleeves while displaying their talents and skills. Many athletes and rap artists talk disparagingly about the hostile environment that has shaped their hardened consciousness. They boast how, with strength and courage, they have survived the hardcore elements of their neighborhood. They tell compelling stories of growing up young, black, and male in the "hood"—a place where masculinity is affirmed by acting tough as nails and staring death in the face.

> "The fact is that we need to be in control of our bodies. We cannot allow circumstances to be the determinant of how we see ourselves."
> Marc Williams

In most cases, courses in rational thinking and conflict resolution are not offered on the streets. It is no wonder you see a culture of young, gifted black men displaying an impenetrable gaze, hard enough to even make death turn away and flee.

The intimidating stare, in-your-face dunk and the black male bravado of the 1990's has replaced the love, compassion, brotherhood and unity of the '70s. In sports, the black male can openly say, "Hear me, see me, this is who I am" in way that is denied in almost every other profession or trade. In rap music, hyper-masculine machismo is the rapper's way of reclaiming the power lost in the moment he finds out that being male and black is different from anything in America.

As a black male, I see the images portrayed in rap videos and in athletic arenas carried out on the streets of Boston and Newark. I see young men on the basketball court taunting opponents in a fashion that is exclusive to the black male culture. Sometimes when the situation calls for it, I too, do the same. It doesn't matter that I will have a Master's Degree in May and thus profess to "know better" than participate in a game of acting tough and playing hard. I am a product of the same socialization process that makes it unacceptable for many men to let down their guard and back down from meaningless confrontations and senseless violence.

Fortunately for me, I have learned much more about my own masculinity, and what it means to be a man. I see its effects manifesting itself through masculine violence in the streets and on the playing fields.

Many black men in my generation can relate to the rap songs that speak to the core aspects of our reality. The words spoken about our environment in black popular culture are real and glaring. Rap music in particular has become a voice to vent those feelings, and as a result, it has come under tremendous fire. I think critics of rap music are missing the warning signs being displayed by my generation of black men. A cry for help is emanating from the mouth of an entire gender-specific culture.

The emergence of the black middle class and the gains of the civil rights movement in the '60s increased the possibility of opportunities for African-Americans and gave our parents hope for the future. Movies such as Soul Food, Crooklyn and The Inkwel, attempt to reunite today's popular culture with wholesome family values of the past. Could this be a time when the roughest and toughest will desperately seek refuge in the innocence of their past? Just listen to the song, "All that I got is you," by Ghostface of Wu-Tang- Clan. This song suggests that we are pondering our childhood for a reason.

Are black males wearing psychological hard hats of camouflage that conceal the gut-wrenching turmoil and inner pain caused by the inner-city environment? Let's call it "inner-city blues." The "harder than hard" mentality is an escape from our fragile, "softer than soft" emotions. God gave us emotions to feel, but somewhere along the line, someone told us that showing these feelings would not be "cool." I am concerned. I know there is more to my generation than the rough and tough image that has been glamorized and embraced by our culture.

I love rap music, I am a part of the hip-hop generation. I am a fan of groups ranging from artists like KRS-1 and Common, to groups like The Roots and Wu-Tang-Clan. I love sports. I am a former scholarship track athlete at a Division I school. However, I am concerned about the facade being portrayed by rappers and athletes who are enthralled with proving their masculinity. False bravado, instant gratification, negative attitudes and deviant behavior, for the most part, have replaced our youth — lost innocence and lost lives.

These attitudes are penetrating many of our young impressionable boys, sending the wrong message of what it means to be a man. Lyrics that condone the mistreatment of black women infiltrate the minds of millions of black boys, contributing to negative attitudes and violence against women. We are losing a generation — a generation that is misguided and confused. A generation of black men struggling to make a way for ourselves, but we can't see the forest through the trees. Today's black male rap musicians are the voices screaming for help. I know America hears our songs and enjoys our athletic prowess, but is anyone listening to our cries?

One Time For The Mind: We Are Still Here

In honor of Black History Month, I am proud to realize that through 400 years of slavery, as a race, we are still here.

Though at times the discussion of black unity is to return to our roots, it's time to remember that America has been the second root to many Black Americans today. Whether or not we realize it, America has had a fundamental role in the way we have trangressed over the years. This land was built on the emasculating efforts of oppression. The "isms" that plague us to this day were planted when the United States were founded.

Allana E. Todman

Racism, colorism, sexism, classism are some of these "isms," and the list goes on. There are many panels, conferences, workshops, and information sessions about how, as a country, we can change some of the negative practices of racism, but has anyone really stopped for one second to think? Once again, our nation from the beginning was built on these ill-ism' traits. The part that astounds me the most is that these "isms" mostly effect the people who helped to create this nation! Black history month is not just for the African-American, but it is also interconnected with the struggles and accomplishments of our cultural peers (Native Americans for examples).

Native Americans reigned in their tribal lands before the states came to existence. They honored the trees and the very ground they walked on. "There was a great difference in the attitude taken by the Indian and the Caucasian toward nature, and this difference made one a conservationist. The Indian, as well as all other creatures that were given birth and grew were sustained by the common mother–earth," Teresa Amott, co–author of the book, "Race, Gender and Work," said.

This land, was respected and honored by the Native Americans. Responsibilities between women and men were based on what needed to be taken care of. The term "gender division" was not a part of their vocabulary. For example, women from the Ojibway tribe built lodges and decided who would be allowed to stay in their home. In our university town of Amherst, we can take notice that the oppression of the Native American was evident by looking at a quote that Jeffrey Amherst made in 1752.

"You will be well advised to infect the Indians with sheets upon which small pox patients have been lying or by any other means which may serve to exterminate this accursed race," stated Amherst. To create the States, a forceful effort of deleting all parts of their culture took place. Forcing young students to attend all American schools, where they could not speak their native language, is just one way that this began to demean the Native American race. Don't you see it was in this same way that the early African– American, was forced to lose thier original identity? Creating false names for the slave was provided by the slave masters. Similiarly, like the Native Americans, we as a Black race were forced not to speak in our native language. Once again, as a minority, we are all still here. Through the struggles and genocide, we have managed to take some pieces of our early roots with us. For starters we can observe the way we dress.

Now ya'll ever wonder why you will see a brother decked out in Tommy Hilfiger, when you know he can't even afford to buy his books for school? Or when a sister will spend her last check to get that weave, extensions or a touch up? Once again it starts with the slavery days. Creating this nation, we didn't have money, but what we did have was pride in the depths of our hearts.

Pride that allowed us as slaves to distinguish ourselves by braiding our hair in distinct patterns. We showed our pride by sewing our own dresses for going out in the fields to work. As an outsider looking into the minority culture, one might not understand the way we jam to those songs that force us to thrust our hips the way that we do. Or perhaps tilt our heads forward and back to the deep bass in our music. It's the distant African drum that silently echoes throughout all of the R&B and Rap music we hear. These are rhythms that beckon, Latino/as, Asians, and Native Americans to embrace the distinct but similiarities of an oppressed race.

Though twenty eight days were set aside for America to acknowledge our "blackness" we all know that we realize it every time we look into the mirror. But if this is the only time that you have stopped to reflect on our history as a people, you should feel proud. When you go to that class and realize that you feel as if you are out of place because you are the only person of color, that's when you push your shoulders back and sit in the front of the class. Or when you step into an interview fully aware of you capabilities, but are doubtful that the employer is certain of his or her confidence in you, that's when you speak in a more assertive tone. For this Black History month, begin today to assume the position, that there is no wrong reasoning for the reasons you are at where you are today.

to preserve the victory.

"I thought that the whole team played well. They let me see a lot of shots," said Regan, who got help from the goal post on a shot by Tom Nolan with about two minutes to play. "I don't think that we could have played any better than we did today."

"To be honest with you, I really had some doubts about going back with Brian Regan in this game because he didn't play that well," Mallen said. "But I know what kind of competitor he is, and I knew that if I put him out there tonight, then he would compete. He came out and did a great job."

UMass jumped out to a quick 1–0 lead at the 1:16 mark when freshman Jeff Turner took a feed from Stephens on a three–on–two rush and beat a sprawling Matile.

New Hampshire came right back to knot the game at 1–1 on a breakaway goal by Mark Mowers at 13:43 of the first. Mowers blocked a shot by Dean Stork, gathered the loose puck in the neutral zone, and slid one by Regan.

Mike Gaffney then put UMass back on top at 1:11 of the second period, as he blistered a slap shot over the right shoulder of Matile.

The Wildcats struck right back, however, for a pair of goals in the next five minutes. Derek Bekar scored at 2:18, and Jason Krog netted his 30th at 6:10. From that point on, UNH controlled the tempo and looked to be heading to another victory.

But thanks to some third period heroics by the Minutemen, the Wildcats didn't. Instead, the celebrating belonged to UMass, who now trails Merrimack by one point for the final HE playoff spot with two weeks to go in the season.

Tyrone Weeks, UMass' lone senior, scored the final basket of the Minutemen's overtime win against St. Joseph's Saturday.

why he's become a better shooter."

However, the Minutemen may be resting their tournament hopes on the effectiveness of their big men, Lari Ketner and Tyrone Weeks.

If Ketner's dominating play the past few weeks is any sign of the future, then UMass should be confident. Ketner has scored in double–figures in each of the last five games, and over the last seven, the Philadelphia–product is averaging nearly 20 points and seven rebounds.

This includes outbursts of 33 points against Dayton (Feb. 1) and 34 points — a career high — Saturday against St. Joe's.

Tyrone Weeks, who scored nine points in his final career home game Saturday, provides the veteran leadership for UMass.

Weeks hit the second biggest shot of the game Saturday. With the shot clock running down in overtime, and with UMass holding onto a one–point lead, the senior knocked down a jumper just inside the arc to give Massachusetts a commanding lead.

The last real link to the 1996 Final Four team, Weeks knows what it takes to win big ball games and has made it his trademark to be the work horse and to sacrifice his body for the team.

quarterfinal game in the William D. Mullins Center, and are scheduled to play the winner of the East No. 5–West No. 4 game.

Should the Minutewomen win the quarterfinal game, UMass will also serve as the host site for the A–10 semifinal and championship games. Those games are scheduled for March 1 and 2.

UMass' first ever Atlantic 10 East title is just one of several milestones the Minutewomen passed this season. With UMass' win over Fordham earlier this season coach Joanie O'Brien became the winningest basketball coach in the history of UMass women's basketball, as well as the first to achieve 100 wins.

With her eight assists against George Washington Mitchell became UMass' all–time career assists leader. The win over GW was another landmark for the Minutewomen, as it was just their second victory over the Colonials in school history.

careers. Until yesterday, that is.

For senior goaltender Brian Regan (38 saves) and his classmates, this is one of their best wins — but not the best.

"We have a lot of wins that we remember and enjoy, but it's tough to pick one out," Regan said, who pointed to wins over Maine and Boston College in the HE playoff play–in game in 1995 as highpoints. "It'd be different if we were winning 20 games a year, and then you could say 'it was that one game, but you learn to cherish all the games you win."

With an upcoming home–and–home series against the Terriers this weekend, that mark might be totally rectified for this year's senior class.

• Along with BU, you can truly consider UNH one of the top rivals for UMass. A string of one–sided victories at the Whittemore Center abound, such as Friday night's 7–3 win for the Wildcats, but the last two seasons have shown much closer contests when the two teams face off at the "Mull."

Two one–goal victories for UNH were the difference last season, but a one–goal victory for the Minutemen was the result this time.

"I wouldn't disagree with that, because it seems every time we come here they play great," UNH coach Richard Umile said. "I don't know what it is, but this goes way back into the '70's with some of their upsets over us."

With the victory, UMass is now one point behind Merrimack for the last postseason playoff spot in Hockey East. So, this upset could not have come at a better time.

But in the end, the best motivation for the Minutemen in this specific game was not on their side of the boards, but on the media's side of the boards.

Two weeks ago, before the first game of the season series between UMass and UNH in Durham, the Wildcat student newspaper writers published their picks for that game. Among some of the obtuse prognostications that said the Minutemen were a "glorified Div. III hockey program" were picks for the score to be 12–0, so Minuteman assistant coach Chris Salani plastered these little gems on the team's bulletin board.

And like Confucius said, "He who laughs last, laughs best." Regan and freshman Nick Stephens, who scored the game–winning goal, turned those obtuse statements into a very acute win.

"I'd like to see their paper, and I'm sure all the credit will go to UNH playing poorly, and us being lucky," Regan said. "That's the media. That's what they want to stir up, and I say go for it. Make up all the billboard stuff you want, but one way to motivate a team is telling them they'll beat you 12–0. Every guy saw it, and every guy read it. That's motivation, and it's unfortunate we didn't beat them there."

"I just wish I could meet the guy," Stephens said, with a devilish grin.

Well, if the team can make the HE playoffs, Stephens just might get his chance.

Clarke's three propels UMass to win in nailbiter

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Charlton Clarke made the biggest play of the game from behind the three-point arc, a trey to send the game to overtime.

Thank God for Charlton Clarke.

For the second game in a row, Clarke hit a three-pointer with time running out to force overtime, snatching another chance from the jaws of a feisty St. Joseph's. But unlike Wednesday's Rhode Island game, UMass (20-7, 12-2 Atlantic 10) didn't let this one get away. Tyrone Weeks made his last shot in the Mullins Center a memorable one by draining a 15-footer with eight seconds left, and Massachusetts snuck out with an 82-79 win Saturday.

St. Joseph's	79

Clarke followed up last week, when he was tabbed with an A-10 Player of the Week selection, with an even better week, and saved the Minutemen from what appeared to be a certain loss. Both Flint and St. Joe's coach Phil Martelli agreed that the Hawks (9-15, 2-12) outplayed the Minutemen, but in a season in which wins have been few and far between for the Hawks, yesterday's loss may have been the toughest for St. Joe's to swallow.

"A loss is a loss, but that was a win," Martelli said. "We just gave it away. We played better than [UMass] for 45 minutes... [but] they get a lot of credit for believing in that 'Refuse to Lose' stuff."

With 8.7 seconds left in regulation, it looked as though St. Joe's had pulled off one of the biggest upsets in the Atlantic 10 this season. UMass was down 75-72, and a Jonathan DePina pass was knocked away. UMass was forced to foul, and Hawk forward Duval Simmonds went to the line with the chance to put to make it a two-possession game. Flint buried his face in his hands, and people started leaving thinking Massachusetts had suffered what would have been one of its most disappointing loss of the season.

But Simmonds missed both free throws, setting the stage for Clarke's heroics. After throwing a pass away with less than 30 seconds left and UMass down 73-72, Clarke told DePina that he'd get that one back. Wide open on the left wing, Clarke drained the three with two seconds left on a shot that floated like a rainbow, saving the Minutemen's fortunes once again.

UMass then held the Hawks scoreless for the last two minutes in overtime, and junior center Lari Ketner scored six of his 34 points in the extra frame.

Clarke ended the day with 15 points, and is averaging 17 points a game over UMass' last six contests.

"When we got into overtime, we said we were going to win, [that it wasn't going to be] like [the Rhode Island game]," Weeks said.

St. Joe's put the Minutemen in their sticky predicament by shooting 68 percent in the second half. The Hawks opened the half with a 24-8 run that turned a 33-28 halftime deficit into a 52-41 lead. Relying almost exclusively on Ketner, who at one point scored 14 straight points, UMass spent the remainder of the half chipping away at the lead. The Minutemen went to a full-court press to rattle the Hawks, and Clarke eventually tied the game at 67 with a three at the 2:40 mark.

According to Flint, Ketner's big day was because the Hawks had nobody to match up with the 6-foot-10 center, who set a career high with his 34 points.

Monty Mack gave UMass the lead with a three with 1:08 left in regulation, before four free throws from Harold Rasul gave the Hawks a 75-72 lead.

Martelli, known as one of the more colorful coaches in college basketball, wasn't thinking about religion during those final seconds, even though he coaches a school that travels with its own priest. He said he thought, "You [expletive]!" when he saw Clarke's game-tying three drop. But he had nice things to say about Clarke's game, saying an argument could be made for Clarke as the A-10 Player of the Year.

"Clarke is mentally tough, and in college basketball players like that are few and far between. He's improved every day since he's been here," Martelli said.

Keys to continued success found on UMass roster

By Corey Peter Goodman
Collegian Staff

Complain as much as you want about the Massachusetts men's basketball team's narrow overtime defeat of St. Joseph's Saturday, 82-79.

But the fact remains that UMass (20-7, 12-2 Atlantic 10) — which reached the elusive 20-win mark, almost assuring itself a spot in the field of 64 come March — is learning the valuable lessons of success just when it needs it most, heading into tournament season.

Last week, junior Charlton Clarke hit the two biggest shots of his career in two games over three days.

Wednesday against Rhode Island, Clarke knocked down a three-pointer at the end of regulation to send the game into overtime. And Saturday he matched the feat against the Hawks.

Not that we're counting, but he also swished three free throws in the final seconds of the URI game's first overtime to keep the Minutemen's comeback hopes alive.

Anyway you look at it, this is the team leader, the guy you give the ball to when the game is on the line, an intrinsic member of all championship teams.

St. Joe's coach Phil Martelli, who led his team to an A-10 championship and Sweet Sixteen appearance last season, knows the value of a proven leader in March.

"He [Clarke] hits the big shots. But you have a guy here who is mentally tough," he said. "If you look across the country, they are few and far between."

Though Clarke is getting his due recognition now following his heroic efforts last week, the truth is that he's been a UMass leader and among the top players in the A-10 all season.

He's scored in double-figures 16 times, including a career- high 24-point effort against Rhode Island. Against the other top teams in the league and nation, he's been just as good.

But Clarke has saved his best for the stretch run. In the Minutemen's last seven games, Clarke — once considered a versatile guard and inconsistent shooter — has scored in double-figures all seven times and is averaging almost 18 points a game.

Massachusetts coach Bruiser Flint attributed the improved play to Clarke's disciplined work ethic.

"He's putting the time in," Flint said. "He's shooting before and after practice and on the weekends. That's

Women's hoop captures East title

UMass wins A-10 East

By Jackie Leroux

For the first time in school history the Massachusetts women's basketball team has captured the Atlantic 10 East division title. The Minutewomen were in a tie for first place with St. Joseph's, but ended the season on an eight-game winning streak and took the top spot for themselves.

UMass played its final game of the regular season against St. Bonaventure (15-13, 7-9) on Saturday at the Reilly Center in Olean, N.Y. The Minutewomen won, 65-54, and ended their regular season with an overall record of 17-9, and a conference record of 11-5. With the win over the Bonnies, UMass clinched a No. 1 seed in the Atlantic 10 Tournament.

Sophomore guard Alison MacFarland put in yet another strong performance for the Minutewomen, finishing the game with a team-high 22 points. She shot 7-for-14 from the field, including 4-of-5 from three-point land.

UMass grabbed a 21-10 lead with 9:30 left in the first half after an 11-4 run. The run was keyed by MacFarland, who hit a pair of three-pointers.

The Bonnies then made an 11-0 run of their own, tying the game at 21-21 with 4:40 left to play. Senior guard Sabriya Mitchell nailed a three of her own to give the lead back to UMass. The Minutewomen were able to hold off the Bonnies and went into halftime with a 30-28 lead.

UMass started the second half with an 11-5 run and led 47-35 at the 12:12 mark. MacFarland was the key yet again, as she chipped in five of the team's 11 points.

The Bonnies tried to make another comeback late in the half, pulling within six at one point. Junior center Yolanda Rayside hit a layup with 2:18 remaining to seal the game for the Minutewomen. She collected her third double-double of the season in the win, with 13 rebounds and 11 points.

The Minutewomen earned a bye for the first round of the A-10 tournament and will wait until the quarterfinals to play. They will host the

Hockey registers improbable win over No. 3 Wildcats

The Massachusetts hockey team wasn't given much of a chance against No. 3 New Hampshire on Sunday afternoon at the William D. Mullins Center. After suffering a 7-3 setback on Friday night at the Whittemore Center in Durham, N.H., and carrying a five- game losing streak into the contest, the Minutemen were seemingly facing an uphill battle to say the least.

Massachusetts	4
New Hampshire	3

But to the surprise of the Wildcats, UMass got goals from Dean Campanale and freshman Nick Stephens in the final 10 minutes to turn a 3-2 deficit into a 4-3 victory over New Hampshire.

"This was a tremendous win for us. There's no doubt about it," Massachusetts hockey coach Joe Mallen said. "This was a typical Hockey East game, where the last place team can beat the first place team on any given night."

The fireworks were few and far between for the opening 40 minutes, as the Minutemen (6-21-2, 3-16-1 in Hockey East) trailed 3-2 heading into the third period, and were being outplayed in practically all aspects of the game.

But the tides turned midway through the third when Jeff Blanchard won a battle along the boards in the UNH zone. He kicked the loose puck to Kris Wallis, who flipped the disk to a wide open Campanale in front, who put one through the five hole of Wildcats goalie Sean Mattle.

"All I saw was the red light go on, and that was enough to make me sick," New Hampshire coach Richard Umile said.

New Hampshire (23-6-1, 14-5-1 in HE) continued to apply the pressure, but UMass got the game-winner at the 15:40 mark on a bizarre play.

A clearing attempt by UMass resulted in what looked like a probable two-on-one break for the Minutemen. Mattle then came out of his net to the faceoff circle, trying to win the race to the puck. However, his clearing attempt was deflected in front to a waiting Stephens, who buried the puck into an empty net.

"I thought that the goalie was going to get it. I was surprised that he didn't," said Stephens, who also assisted on a goal by Jeff Turner earlier in the game. "I had a wide open net to shoot at. Goals like those are gifts. I just made sure that I beared down and put it in."

"Hockey is a crazy game. They scored goals every crazy way that I thought that they could," Umile said. "I give Joe Mullen credit. They are a program that keeps battling and battling, and Regan is a guy who can beat you by himself when he's in the net."

Senior goaltender Brian Regan was the story on Sunday, stopping 38 shots. The New Milford, Conn. native stood his ground the entire afternoon and made several spectacular stops in the closing minutes

Motivation on UMass' side as hockey befuddles UNH

Before yesterday's game against No. 3 New Hampshire, to believe the Massachusetts hockey team would beat the Wildcats would have been like believing Peter McNeely really could have spun Mike Tyson in his "cocoon of horror."

However, unlike McNeely's early demise at the hands of the self-proclaimed "most dangerous man in the world," the Minutemen spun the Wildcats in their own cocoon of horror.

Like David vs. Goliath... like the 1980 U.S. Olympic hockey team... like UMass' win over then-No. 1 Maine in 1995... the classic underdog story evolved at the William D. Mullins Center yesterday afternoon, and the Minutemen came away with a thrilling 4-3 win over highly regarded UNH.

Motivation is a big key when it comes to such a stunning upset — just with state bragging rights at hand, don't you think North Carolina State had enough motivation to defeat No. 1 North Carolina this past weekend? — and such was the same in this amazing win for UMass.

You can point to a variety of things that would cause the Minutemen to be motivated for this weekend's home game against one of the top teams in the country. Such as:

This year's senior class had not registered a win over the Wildcats or No. 4 Boston University in their four-year

Northern Ireland peace talks uncertain

BELFAST, Northern Ireland (AP) — Peace talks on the future of Northern Ireland have suddenly been overtaken by the issue of who has behaved well enough to sit at the negotiating table.

Talks were to resume yesterday with the Catholic-based Sinn Fein party temporarily excluded, serving a two-week suspension after two recent killings were blamed on its ally, the Irish Republican Army. Meanwhile, a pro-British Protestant party banished last month from the talks will regain admission to the negotiating venue at Stormont, the center of British administration for Northern Ireland.

Britain and Ireland, which are sponsoring the talks, had suspended the Ulster Democratic Party after the paramilitary group it represents, the Ulster Defense Association, admitted killing Catholics, a violation of its own October 1994 truce.

Last week, the governments ruled that the IRA was responsible for killing two Belfast men earlier this month.

Alleged spies plead innocent to charges

Alexandria, Va. (AP) — Three former college radicals pleaded innocent yesterday to charges they conspired to spy on the United States for East Germany, the Soviet Union, Russia and South Africa from 1972 to 1997.

U.S. District Judge Claude M. Hilton scheduled trial for May 20 for James M. Clark, a 49-year-old private investigator and former Army paralegal; Theresa Maria Squillante, a 40-year-old former Defense Department lawyer; and her 43-year-old husband, Kurt Alan Stand, a labor union representative.

Prosecutors said the three met in the mid-1970s as student radicals at the University of Wisconsin in Milwaukee. They were arrested Oct. 4 in an FBI sting and have been held without bond. They have denied the allegations.

The Justice Department has not decided whether it will seek the death penalty.

A federal indictment returned last week accused Clark of delivering secret and top-secret defense documents to East Germany between 1979 and 1984.

The grand jury said those documents included State Department personnel records.

Amherst select board discusses parking garage

By Samantha Poulten
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — The Amherst Select Board met last night to discuss progress in the building of the downtown parking garage, the development of a smoking ban in local bars, and the 20-minute parking spaces on Boltwood Walk.

Amherst citizens voted in favor of building the parking garage on Boltwood Walk by a narrow margin of 95 votes. With such a slim mandate, trouble moving forward with the development of the garage is anticipated. An architect was scheduled to be contracted on or before April 10, with a final design made by the end of June.

However, it was brought to the Board's attention that the progression of the garage is not moving quite as swiftly as previously hoped. All plans for the garage have been pushed back at least a month, with an architect not scheduled to be signed until May.

Part of the reason for the delay is so three town meetings can be held before the final plans are made.

The Amherst Board of Health updated its progress on the smoking ban in local bars, which was unanimously passed on Feb. 11. The Board is working in conjunction with the Amherst bars to try to persuade them to put the ban into effect by April 1. Bar owners must comply with the ban by the July 1 deadline.

The Board of Health said they are also working with surrounding towns in order to try to make the ban on smoking in bars a community effort.

Towns like Belchertown and Hadley still allow smoking in their bars, which many suspect will cause Amherst residents to travel instead of patronizing local bars. The final vote on the wording of the regulation will take place on February 26.

The Select Board brought up the issue of nine 20-minute parking spaces on Boltwood Walk. The question was whether or not these spaces were needed for Amherst residents to do quick business in town offices and purchase their take-out food from restaurants in the area.

There had been complaints that the parking spaces were never full, and that only four spaces were needed. However, one resident claimed the spaces are always full at night when most people buy take-out from restaurants including Pinocchio's. Opponents of the parking spaces said that with the addition of the new parking garage, extra 20-minute spaces are not needed.

The Select Board decided that more research would be needed to determine if the parking spaces should remain 20- minute zones.

The Community Services Department laid out their plans for development in Amherst, including trying to build a youth center in the downtown area. The department would like to create a center with pools, gym equipment, and after school activities, much like a YMCA.

One proposed sight for the center is the Amherst Cinema downtown on Amity Street. Community Services members said that a center is needed not only for the youth, but also for the elderly who are increasing in numbers in the Amherst area.

REAP receives funding to expand programs aimed at curbing drinking

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

Recently, the Residential Education Alcohol Program (REAP) was given $513.16 by the University of Massachusetts Police Department in an effort to help increase the program's funding.

According to UMass Police Chief John Luippold, police officers decided to redeem cans and bottles they confiscated from students for illegal possession of alcohol and donate the money to REAP, a program which educates students on alcohol and drug addiction.

REAP director Sandra Whitcomb plans to use the money to advertise the program's resources.

According to Whitcomb, the majority of the students she and her interns work with are mandated through the District Court system and referred through UMass' judicial system.

However, any student can take advantage of REAP's resources.

"We can act as a sounding board for students who are not sure if they have a problem with drugs or alcohol. We provide confidential assessments for all students," Whitcomb said.

Whether students are mandated to attend REAP session or participate on their own, students will participate in three weekly group meetings and no less than two individual counseling sessions.

At the beginning of each new group session, Whitcomb said mandated students often have attitude problems because many of them feel they are being punished.

"We have to establish trust and cut through the defensiveness before we can move on," she said.

Whitcomb said she attempts to explain to the groups they must be responsible for their actions while they are drinking, and while intoxicated events can quickly get out of hand.

She tells her groups "when you are drunk you are a heartbeat away from heartache."

"Students so often do things they would never normally do while they are drinking. There is never a good excuse to drink to get drunk even though it is so normative on our campus," Whitcomb said.

Through group discussions, she gets students look at the how their chances of getting into trouble increases while they are drunk. Next, the group discusses options to minimize those chances.

One way to achieve that goal is to limit the amount of alcohol consumption, she said.

"For many students, changing their drinking habits is a lifestyle

Hillel House hosts third "Choices" lecture tonight

By Elana Premack
Collegian Correspondent

Tonight, the University of Massachusetts Hillel House will sponsor a panel discussion titled "Helping Others and Ourselves Deal with Sickness and Dying." The discussion is the third in the Hillel series on "Making Choices on Loving, Living and Dying," and will be held at 7 p.m. at Hillel House.

The panel features Rabbi Nancy Flam, renowned for her work concerning Jewish healing, along with Northampton family physician Dr. Henry Simkin.

The speakers will focus on Judaism's views on popular issues including life support, euthanasia and assisted suicide. Flam and Simkin will share knowledge about supporting and helping others in making decisions concerning health as well as finding personal strength during stressful times.

"This is the ideal program for people who have personally dealt with sickness as well as people who just want to think about the issue," Rabbi Saul Permluter said.

Both panelists have lectured previously: Flam on the topic of Judaism and healing and Simkin on living wills and the Massachusetts Health Care Proxy law.

"These are good people to talk with and they have a lot of knowledge to share," Permluter said.

Flam is the co-founder of the Jewish Healing Center and a consultant and faculty member of Synagogue 2000, the Spirituality Institute and the National Center for Jewish Healing. She has written articles on Judaism and healing which have been published in Reform Judaism Magazine and Sh'ma: A Journal of Jewish Responsibility and has contributed to Wrestling with the Angel. Jewish Insights on Death and Mourning, edited by Jack Reimer, and Healing of Soul, Healing of Body, edited by Rabbi Simkha Y. Weintraub, CSW.

A physician at Kaiser Permanente's Northampton Health Center, Simkin is a member of the Massachusetts Ethics Committee of Kaiser Permanente.

A combination of the contribution of the panelists and the interaction of the audience will hopefully help people come to terms with what Permluter described as "really tough issues."

"Hopefully this program will make people feel helpful instead of helpless," Permluter said.

The next discussion in the series will be held on April 21, and will feature the author of the novel In This Dark House, Louise Kehoe. Kehoe will discuss the effect of her father's hidden Judaism around the time of the Holocaust on her family and her personal search for identity.

Explosions mar Indian elections

By Ashok Sharma
Associated Press

NEW DELHI, India — Leftist guerrillas set off a mine yesterday that killed five soldiers sent to guard polling stations in India's parliamentary elections. The explosion and other attacks raised the election-related death toll to 29 over two days.

The soldiers were traveling to polling stations in Andhra Pradesh state, where voting in India's staggered nationwide elections picks up again Saturday. Another 37 soldiers were injured.

Police suspect the outlawed Peoples War Group, who had urged a boycott of the vote.

Balloting yesterday in Nagaland and Mizoram, two remote northeastern states, was the third in a six-day election. The first two days, Feb. 16 and Sunday, completed voting for three-fourths of the 543 legislative districts at stake. More than 600 million Indians are eligible to vote.

Tribal guerrillas seeking autonomy called for a boycott in Nagaland, supported by opposition parties and student groups. But election officials said turnout was nearly 42 percent.

Also yesterday, a court reinstated a right-wing Hindu nationalist govern-

Annan, Hussein negotiate deal to end conflict

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — Shortly before noon Sunday, Annan and three aides were driven in government limousines to meet Saddam. No one in the U.N. delegation knew where they were going.

They wound up at the Republican Palace, the sprawling presidential compound along the Tigris. Saddam — dressed in a blue business suit, instead of the usual military uniform — shook hands with the negotiators and posed for pictures.

After formalities, the aides left the room, leaving Annan and Saddam alone with an interpreter. After two hours, aides said, Annan knew he had a deal. He returned to the guesthouse, where dozens of reporters, photographers and television crews were crowded around the front gate, jostling with Iraqi security guards trying to keep the entrance clear.

When the guards opened the gate for an impromptu news conference, the crowds rushed forward, trampling over rose bushes to get a good spot.

U.N. spokesman Fred Eckhard, standing on top of marble steps, said the secretary-general was "on the verge of a breakthrough." However, Clinton advisers making the rounds on Sunday television talk shows hadn't been informed how close Annan was to a deal. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright said on ABC as Saddam was reviewing the proposal that the United States wouldn't accept anything less than full inspections: "It is possible that he will come with something that we don't like, in which case we will pursue our national interests." At 8 p.m. Sunday, the two delegations assembled again at the Foreign Ministry. With the "go ahead" from Saddam, Aziz said Iraq was willing to open the palaces.

All that was left was to work out the final details of the text. By 9:15 p.m., the deal was done. Annan returned to the villa to telephone leaders of the permanent Security Council members, including Albright, which must approve the deal.

change," Whitcomb said.

However for many of those students, a lifestyle change while in REAP is attainable. But once the sessions are over, students are on their own and must adhere to those changes while living with friends who continue to drink and party on a regular basis and without follow-ups from REAP workers.

A lifestyle change that for some is close to impossible Whitcomb said.

For this reason, and increased referrals from the courts and the judicial system, Whitcomb thinks its is vitally important the REAP be able to hire case managers and full time employees.

"Many students who are seen in REAP need to be followed up on. They are able to make those lifestyle changes while they are here but after they leave, student often go back to their old ways," Whitcomb said. "If the University is really serious about intervening with drug and alcohol problems on this campus then we need to them."

Currently, Whitcomb is the only full-time employee at REAP and works closely with three interns.

"The intern turnover rate is high. Every year I must train the interns. so much of my time goes into getting the interns up to speed. I need trained professionals in addition to my interns," she said.

Despite the low number of workers in the program, many students do not revert back to their old drinking habits.

In a paper written by a freshman woman who was referred to REAP through the judicial system, the author pointed out many of her bad drinking behaviors such as sleeping days away due to hangovers, black outs, and having a tolerance level that allowed her to have eight shots of alcohol and still not feel drunk.

However, this woman, who had asked to remain confidential, set a realistic goal for herself. A goal that would still allow her to drink and pay attention to how much she consumes during the night.

"I am also going to be drinking my beers much more slowly. Instead of a couple in one hour, I'm going to cut back to less than one beer per hour," she said.

Students who want more information about REAP may call Whitcomb at 545-0137 or go to the office in the lobby of Moore Residence Hall.

ment dismissed in Uttar Pradesh, India's largest state, over the weekend after two of its coalition partners withdrew support. The court order came as a boost for the Bharatiya Janata Party, which is widely expected to take the most seats in the election but fall short of a majority.

On Sunday night, the Maoist guerrillas triggered another mine that killed four election officers and two policemen bringing ballot boxes to central collection stations. Another political activist was stabbed to death overnight, United News of India news agency reported.

Violence is a regular feature of Indian elections, with rival parties battling for control of polling stations. Despite the casualty toll, election officials claim violence this year is no worse than usual.

Three men were killed in clashes overnight after voting ended in the eastern state of West Bengal.

Twelve people were killed in voting in nine states on Sunday and 23 died in the first phase of voting Feb. 16.

UMass tennis tops Temple

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

It came down to the very last match of the afternoon, but the Massachusetts women's tennis team overcame a tough Temple team to win 4-3 Sunday afternoon in Ludlow.

With the early round matches completed, UMass was tied 3 apiece with the Lady Owls, as Emily Wegner took on Anie Doley.

It was decided that they would play one pro set for the match because of time constraints. The men's team was set to take on Temple on the same courts as soon as Wegner's match was completed.

Wegner was moved up to No. 5 singles before the match, because Temple came shorthanded with only five players.

They automatically forfeited No. 6 singles and No. 3 doubles. Therefore to give Wegner a chance to play, coach Judy Dixon moved her up a notch.

"I was not sure who to play at No. 5, it was between Emily and Lana Gorodetskaya," Dixon said. "If I played Lana at singles, Emily would not get to compete at all, so I moved her up."

The switch paid off for the Minutewomen. In front of the entire men's and women's tennis teams, Wegner pulled out a thriller over Doley, 8-6. Wegner had jumped ahead 6-3, but subsequently squandered the lead to a tie, 6-6. But she put it together to pull out the final two games and the match for UMass.

"Emily was terrific for us," Dixon said. "The heat was on and she came out on top, not only on a personal level but for the entire team."

In other singles matches, UMass was equally competitive. The No. 2 through No. 4 matches all finished in three sets. Marie Caron dropped a heartbreaker 6-2, 2-2,3-6 to Temple's Kathleen Pete at No. 2. Jackie Braunstein also captured the first set over Tanya Zecic 6-3, before losing 1- 6, 3-6 at No. 3.

"We have had a lot of matches this year where we have won the first set and then dropped the next two," Dixon said. "That is a trend that hopefully will not continue."

Robyn Lebovitz at No. 4 followed suit 6-2, 1-6, 1-6 against Nitya Orora.

While UMass spotted a 1-0 lead in doubles, because of the forfeit, the Minutewomen needed the rest of the doubles' points to pull a win over the Owls.

The Owls got the first bite with Tamara Truta and Kathleen Pete defeating Ola Gerasimova and Marie Caron 9- 7 in a nailbiter at No. 1. Caroline Steele and Lana Gorodetskaya were victorious for the Minutewomen as they won the decisive match over Zecic and Orora 8-4.

"The team needed this one," Dixon said. "This was a team that we felt we were on a similar level with, and we proved that we could handle them."

UMass will now prepare for Tulane, as UMass hosts them on Friday March 6.

Jason Abbott. Freshman Kyle Kintner also excelled in that event, placing fourth.

"It's always hard to be a conference champion and have to defend that title on a given day against tough competition," O'Brien said. "There were four good pole vaulters there and he did the best."

Senior sprinter Scott Price broke his week-old record, pushing his own UMass 55m mark down to 6.41 seconds, placing him fourth in the event. He had run the previous record setting time of 6.43 seconds earlier in the month at Rhode Island as well. Price's 21.69 in the 200m guided him to second place in the A-10.

Massachusetts highly ranked junior, Tom Toye, was troubled by injuries and fell to 14th place in the 200m. Junior Ben Baraldi placed highly in the 55m hurdles with a time of 7.8 seconds.

Throwers Jan Stevens and Vic Morency provided a push for the Minutemen, also. Stevens was second overall in the shot put with a 48'6" throw, and Morency recorded a career best in the 35 lb weight throw with a mark of 53'1.75". Erick Kinston, Tim Ralph, and Edward Boet exemplified the championship effort by sweeping the first three places in the weight throw for Vermont.

The Mountaineers scored a final of 195.3 points, ranking as the second highest score this season and sixth best all- time at WVU.

The second place finish for the Minutewomen breaks their unbeaten streak to bring their record to 8-1. Fisher's perfect 10.00 score was the first ever to be awarded at a UMass home meet and only the second in Minutewomen history. Fisher was the only UMass first-place finisher on the evening. Three different Mountaineers captured the rest of the individual events.

The top two-finishers for the Minutewomen included senior Penny LeBeau and junior Betsy Colucci who placed second and third on vault with a 9.850 and a 9.825, respectively. They were accompanied by the performance of freshman Jobi Goldberg who placed third on bars. Junior Anita Sanyal finished third on the beam and in the all- around as well.

This past weekend's tough schedule is just the beginning of top-ranked opponents for Massachusetts. In their next meet the No. 25 Minutewomen will head out to Tuscaloosa, Ala. to take on No. 3 Alabama, No. 11 Arizona State, and No. 22 North Carolina State in another tri-meet.

13.6 points per game, and is the league's top rebounder at 11.7 rebounds per game.

Dayton — the only team remaining that's undefeated at home — is currently tied with Xavier (10-4), having beaten them in the teams' only meeting this season. They will square off against each other, Sunday, in what may decide the top seed in the West.

But don't count out the George Washington Colonials. GW (9-5) — a game behind the pack — dropped a tough home game to Temple on Sunday.

However, the teams ahead of GW have a relatively tough final week. In addition to the Dayton-Xavier finale, the Flyers are at Duquesne (11-16, 5-9) tomorrow, and Xavier plays at Rhode Island tonight.

The Colonials travel to Virginia Tech (9-15, 4-10) tomorrow, and finish up against the Bunnies on Saturday.

As for the A-10 tournament, your guess is as good as mine.

Mass. Senate set to vote on Pats stadium funding

By Leslie Miller
Associated Press

BOSTON — Senate President Thomas Birmingham's plan for financing a new Foxboro stadium for the New England Patriots is expected to be unveiled Thursday.

But three days before the Senate is to vote on the proposal, few lawmakers seem to know exactly how Birmingham plans to pay for the state's share in the $200 million project.

One thing is clear, however. If House Speaker Thomas Finneran doesn't like the plan, it won't happen.

The proposal came as something of a surprise when Birmingham held a press conference with Patriots' owner Robert Kraft last Thursday.

After years of struggling to find a way to refurbish the existing stadium, the Patriots' owner stood next to Birmingham as they announced a deal in which the Patriots would pay $200 million for a new stadium in Foxboro.

The Patriots would also compensate the state about $2.4 million a year in parking fees, ticket fees and rent — short of the state's estimated annual $7 million in interest costs.

The state would pay up to $20 million to buy Kraft's 336-acre site and invest $52 million in utilities and road construction. But beyond that, neither rank-and-file lawmakers nor members of the Cellucci Administration have seen a written proposal.

"My big issue is the bill," said Secretary of Administration and Finance Charles Baker. "All I've seen is a press release." Baker said he wants to find out what the plan of attack is before the administration decides if it's viable.

Finneran said in a statement yesterday he won't comment until the proposal has been passed by the Senate and analyzed by the House. Lawmakers said they don't expect Finneran, who has already expressed skepticism about the plan, to support it.

"There's a lot of skepticism about putting public money into a stadium and a lot of us want to be certain that there's a revenue stream to offset the state investment," said Rep. Jay Kaufman (D-Lexington).

Legislators are also concerned about the state's ability to pay for a stadium.

The Long-Term Debt Committee, for example, held the first of a series of hearings on yesterday to examine the state's debt burden. Baker testified that dramatic cutbacks in federal funding for Massachusetts' transportation projects — including the $10.8 billion Central Artery project — will put added pressure on the state's ability to finance such projects as open space acquisition, courthouse repairs and prison construction.

Rep. Frank Hynes (D-Marshfield), vice chairman of the Long-Term Debt Committee, questioned whether the state can afford the Big Dig construction project along with $11 billion in capital projects approved by the Legislature along with a new football stadium.

Minuteman Notes: With his heroics against Rhode Island and St. Joseph's, Massachusetts guard Charlton Clarke (12.7 ppg, 3.07 apg) was named A-10 Player of the Week for the second consecutive week. Clarke, who averaged 19.5 ppg for the week, is starting to gain some respect around the league. And many believe the junior will be recognized in the voting for conference Player of the Year, which will be announced next Tuesday in Philadelphia.

Among the other candidates will be Rhode Island's Tyson Wheeler, Temple's Rasheed Brokenborough, Dayton's Ryan Perryman, La Salle's Donnie Carr, St. Joe's Rashid Bey and Duquesne's Mike James.

UMass guard Monty Mack (13.9 ppg, 3.0 apg) is the odds- on favorite for conference Rookie of the Year.

Also, UMass forwards Chris Kirkland (3.5 ppg, 2.4 rpg) and Ajmal Basit (6.8 ppg, 5.6 rpg) will be up for the Chris Daniels Most Improved Player award.

The bitter end

Elsa Allen

Boy, do I feel like a loser! I think that I have finally come to terms with the reality that when I depart from this hallowed campus that I love so much, I will be completely and utterly unemployed.

My realization, which has been coming to me slowly, off and on for the past year, was cemented last week when I ran into a couple of friends in the Campus Center. On my way to the Collegian offices to get a little bit of journalistic experience under my belt, I spotted my friend Adam. He was wearing a tie.

"Whoa, look at you all spiffed up!" I said. "Where are you going?"

"The career fair is today."

"Oh, right," I replied. "I was thinking of checking that out."

In his hand, Adam clasped a folder. When I asked him what it was he produced a stack of freshly printed, professionally produced résumés.

"You have a résumé?," I gasped in disbelief. Wow, I've had, like, three jobs my entire life, none of which I would want printed in black and white for potential employers to view and judge me on. I can picture their reactions now:

"So, you spent four years working at a barn — very interesting."

"Don't overlook the one summer that I spent serving over- priced draft beers to tourists at a really happening beachside restaurant," I'll say.

It'll be amusing, for sure. But amusing doesn't pay the bills and it won't get me hired.

Back to the career fair. I decided to tag along and see where my opportunities lay. Even if I didn't have a résumé, browsing around couldn't hurt, right?

Wrong.

Why don't they have career fairs for real people? For those of us who haven't been held captive in the SOM building for the past three years, taking classes about federal taxes and business law. I know nothing about marketing, computers or finance.

I don't even balance my checkbook!

So there I was, standing amidst hoards of overdressed students, all clamoring around the tables to present their résumés to the representatives of the country's most up and coming companies.

I was wearing jeans.

I didn't have a resumé.

The most I could hope to get out of this career fair was a free ballpoint pen and maybe a mouse pad with a company logo on it (an item that I couldn't really use, but I would take anyway because I feel like the fair owes me something). Unless there's a corporation out there that wants to employ me simply because I took a class called "Witches: Myth and Reality," and because I changed my major three or four times and I have a vast array of experience in many different fields. But, while I view this as a personal strength, demonstrating my willingness to try different things, employers may see it as an inability to commit and a serious lack of decision-making skills.

An inability to commit and four years of cleaning stalls at a barn, now why would anyone not want to hire me?

But, I still refused to give up on this career fair. "All majors welcome!" the signs read. There must be something here for me. But as I cruised around the auditorium, I didn't see one sign that stated a company was interested in journalism majors. No anthropology majors were encouraged to inquire about careers, and not one single English or psychology major was wanted anywhere.

So, those of us in the liberal arts fields are left on our own to face the harsh realities of the world of unemployment. I may be spending the years after college working on the next "Great American novel" or I may be asking simple questions like "Would you like fries with that?" But one thing I won't be doing is working for a company that was represented at the great UMass Career Fair.

Thus, the harsh reality remains. When I can no longer inhabit my quaint Main Street bungalow, living it up with my roommates (neither of whom possess résumés either!) and I have to face the cruel and uncaring "real world," I will not have a job set up for me to start at the day after graduation. The only thing I'll probably have the day after I graduate (which isn't approaching any time real soon) is a pretty severe hangover. After which I'll most likely return home, where I'll remain until my mother finally realizes that I've been sitting on the couch wearing sweatpants and eating cereal for six months and kicks me out. Then maybe I'll bum across Europe or something.

I wonder how that would look on a résumé.

Presidential advice

April 12, 1997:

The prestigious Vice President of the United States of America, Al Gore, realizes that he and his two-time running mate, Bill Clinton, seem to be falling out of the public view. This doesn't necessarily mean much to the president, as Clinton's term limit of two will be expiring by the time the next election rolls around, but to Gore, who is the shoo-in frontrunner for the Democratic party's nomination for president for the 2000 election, publicity is a must. Especially for Gore, as his personality is only slightly more vibrant than John F. Kennedy's (keep in mind that Kennedy is dead), and a jump in press for the White House would be the boost he might need to remain those few vital popularity points above the speculated Republican candidate of the time, Dan Quayle (you remember; "potatoe").

Seth Koenig

Gore, with Clinton's approval, plans to assemble a group of experts to aid him with this problem. Government officials are sent out to the far reaches of the globe to find those persons with unmatched perception. To join this dream team would be those who felt the heartbeat of the world — the eyes and ears of the human population, perhaps. The intelligence level in a room with the recruited ones would be off the scales (If there were some scale that could measure the intelligence level in a room, that is). These would be the best of the best, the cream of the crop, and the ultimate elite.

Within a few weeks, the government finds the six people who can most efficiently make the White House headline news again, and gathers them for an important meeting with the president and vice president. Clinton and Gore both agree to do what the newly arranged panel suggests, and in return for their services, each of the six members will be granted Secret Service protection for the remainder of their lives, along with a cushy government job that pays a six- digit salary for doing absolutely nothing, like "national oxygen breather" or "official eye blinker."

The time comes for this long awaited meeting, and the assembled gods of social conduct, wasting not a second, begin the conversation immediately...

Butthead: Uh, huh-huh. You don't have any cool stuff around here. Why don't you have a toilet on this table or something?

Beavis: Yeah, yeah! Toilets are cool! So are dogs. I always wanted a dog. Hmm-hmm, yeah.

Butthead: Yeah, name it "Buddy" after, you know, your little — Huh-huh — "buddy." People would think that was cool and stuff.

The president makes a note.

Aaron Spelling: Sex always works for me, but not sex with just anyone. Somebody with whom you're not supposed to be having sex with. In other words, not your wife. Perhaps an intern! You know, my daughter's out of work again. I'm sure she'd pass up her next TV movie to give it to you!

The president thinks maybe he's already tried that, but makes a note anyhow.

Quentin Tarantino: Never mind all that, man, I've got your perfect scheme right here. Try and picture lots of violence and raw language for your project, man. It doesn't matter who gets killed, as long as you can talk about it heartlessly, it will be entertaining. For your purposes, I'm thinking we should kill a lot of people. You've got the ultimate trigger, man, so go for it! I'm talking the Middle East somewhere, man! I'm not about shallow production, but you have to remember, guns will keep the people in the seats — that, and Samuel L. Jackson.

The president makes a note and recalls a familiar face overseas he can target (Hey, it worked for Bush).

Richard Simmons: Let me just say I think it's absolutely super how you lost so much weight at the beginning of your presidency, Billy. Can I call you Billy? That jogging thing was darn swell. Al, now you were always a bit slimmer than your boss over there, but there's still room for improvement. Both of you should get my "Sweatin' to the Oldies" workout program. I can call my two latest clients, Bertha and Kong and have you work with them. They're such sweethearts, you know.

Michael Jackson: Plastic surgery is always good. How about getting a nose job?

The president misheard "nose" and makes a note. Clinton and Gore decide to put the plan into effect as soon as possible.

An alternate attack plan

With the very realistic probability of war looming in the near future, I grow more concerned then ever.

Sure, I'm still a little distressed that Kobe Bryant was elected to go to the All-Star game, but after a bowl of ice cream and half a gallon of ice cream, I was able to come down from my room once again. But even ice cream cannot suppress a man's inner anxiety.

According to the economic history of the United States, war has been momentous in inspiring growth for the economy: government spending grows, defense spending increases, and those already wealthy become a beneficiary of death, profit growth and destruction.

Putting aside the benefits of which the rich will mostly consume, war is not a good thing. The leaders, general and corporate elite are asking you to urinate of the third rail. Will you do it?

Don't get me wrong. I love watching people getting smashed, torn and blasted on the screen. And furthermore, I'm not a tied-dyed tea bag pleading with the world to eat more rice cakes. I've done bad. I do bad, and will most likely continue to do bad, but I have never killed anyone. Nevertheless, mayhem, mass death and misery are not attributes that I must have in order to call my day a success. I do not wish for my fellow countrymen to fight and die in empty cries of freedom under the oppressive banner of wealth.

"I do not wish for my fellow countrymen to fight and die in empty cries of freedom under the oppressive banner of wealth.

Nicholas Simmons

I can guess who will benefit from the war and I can assume it will not be me, or for that matter, you. How many CEOs' sons do you think are going to Iraq? How many Senators' sons do you think are going to Iraq? I can guess there are fewer sons of the power elite going to war than there are nipples on an ant.

I do not wish to view on CNN the total annihilation of a race of people; it's a little too real for me. That's right, this is real, and I believe we are padded from such real life carnage. Some forget what armed conflict can do. True we do have "American Gladiators" and those fat Sumo suits, but let's face it: most Americans don't really know what happens in the realm of war and bloodshed. American epidemics are usually solved with flu shots. Think about it, do we really want to kill each other?

To solve the problem I have come up with an excellent solution. For those who want a war, don't worry, you'll get a chance to flex it all. You will be able to make Conan movies and talk silly, but first you must carry out your mission. The United States will send all pro-war supporters to Iraq by inner tube, armed with American flag bathing suits and lots of sand-castle accessories. The factories that made tanks, bombs and corporate lobbyists will be converted to produce at wartime speed, plastic shovels, buckets and American flag nutts.

Republicans and democrats frolicking side by side in the hot desert sand is enough to make even the hardened heart cry. Furthermore, the business section of every national paper will declare huge economic prosperity, so we should have no problem finding brave souls who have so much to die for to fill our attack tubes.

The overweight pro-war Americans will most likely march on Baghdad in the late afternoon, when the sun is great for tanning, scaring the starving Iraqis into submission.

Our hungry soldiers will then proceed to consume Iraq's sand, people and oil. Saddam's republican guard will fight hard and kill many of our elite citizens; but the red, white and blue don't run. We may eat, pollute and exploit, but we're for the most part too damn fat to run.

No weapon is greater than fear and with the country of Iraq shaking in horror, we will have won. We will then build huge shopping malls made with our new mass- produced tools. The sand enforced malls will sell huge amounts of Nikes, Ray-Bans and cash symbol jewelry, putting the remaining Iraqis in unimaginable debt. Their credit will be ruined and the United Nations will forbid them from declaring bankruptcy.

Soon we, or at least some of us, will own Iraq. And, more importantly, those that wished to do battle will have done so. Now is a good place to insert the famous Braveheart speech. And then I say in my best patriotic voice, "I'll water the plants!"

GEO window smashed

To the editor:

After a week of heightened activism amongst the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) membership, on Sunday afternoon (Feb. 22), we found our office window smashed in.

We at GEO condemn any violent act and hope that this was an isolated, individual act of vandalism, not a direct attack upon our union.

If indeed this act of violence was intentional, it is a wake- up call to all the campus unions and progressive organizations. We urge our community and all progressive groups and organizations to join voices against such violations against workers and students.

In no way will such an attack deter us from continuing our campaign for a fair and reasonable contract for the 2,600 graduate employees we represent in our union.

Cartoon in bad taste

To the editor:

I realize you have been having a hard time trying to find cartoonists for the Collegian, but there must be some point where you should draw the limit.

Usually the comics are great, and I like them, but when I looked at "Sven" by Stephen Higgins (Feb. 17), I did not think it was very funny. I realize it's supposed to be a joke, but when people start thinking it's funny to kill, that's when I'll stop reading the Collegian. Please raise your standards!

Boss was right

To the editor:

I was dismayed by the recent over-reaction to Amherst Selectman Hill Boss' "keg" comment regarding the low voter turnout at the two UMass voting precincts by UMass officials and the Student Government Association (SGA).

The only "unfortunate" thing about his idle, flip comment, is that it is unfortunately true. Perhaps we should reserve politically correct phraseology to those issues we are not yet serious about resolving. In the meantime, I appreciate the point of frankness in my local politicians.

If the truth hurts, then let his comment serve as the unanesthetized dentist drill of reality.

University officials and student body representatives spent a lot of effort convincing town officials to create two on- campus voting precincts, essentially redistricting the town. Everybody would like to see greater student participation at election time. And nobody expects a huge turnout from students during purely municipal campaigns. Well, then, we made it easy for you, easier than for most residents who have to drive to the polls. My message to students: Why not vote when you can walk? There were more poll workers present than student voters. This is disgraceful.

If the SGA feels so strongly about Mr. Boss' comments, then why not have a student run against him and unseat him from the Selectboard? Oh, never mind, I forgot. That occurred last April, when hardly any students bothered to show up at the campus precincts to vote for Brian Tirrell. In that election, voter turnout was expected to be light as Mr. Boss was correctly seen as running practically unopposed. I believe inclement weather was seen as another reason for low turnout Mr. Boss was elected with a comfortable margin. It could have been a very tight race, possibly an upset, had Mr. Tirrell used a little initiative. I feel vindicated that I voted for Mr. Boss given these circumstances.

Support Pesticide Disclosure Act

To the editor:

Pesticides are invading our lives and endangering our health because of their use in schools, farms, parks, golf courses and homes. Pesticides are the only chemicals used with the intent to kill. They have been linked to serious health effects in people (reproductive disorders, immunological problems, cancer). Since we have no way of knowing when and where pesticides are sprayed, we are especially vulnerable to the threats posed by these toxins.

The Pesticide Disclosure Act would give citizens notice and warning before pesticide use, make more information available regarding pesticides, and help reduce the use of pesticides by requiring the adoption of least-toxic pest control policies for all state buildings and grounds. This bill is now being considered by the Senate Ways and Means Committee. Meanwhile, the pest control industry is spending a lot of money to oppose the bill. The industry is essentially fighting to keep the public in the dark regarding pesticide use and the health of citizens.

We need to stick together to protect our health and the health of our loved ones. I urge all citizens to contact Senator Rosenberg to counter the opposition and to demand our right to know about pesticide use.

Cole thrives in live setting

LAUREN KUSKY / COLLEGIAN

Paula Cole cast a magical spell at Mount Holyoke College Sunday night.

By Marty Keane
Collegian Staff

PAULA COLE
Chapin Auditorium
Feb. 22

SOUTH HADLEY — What a weird week its already been for Paula Cole. Tomorrow night at New York City's Radio City Music Hall, Cole will be performing to a worldwide television audience numbering in the millions as she competes for seven Grammy awards. Sunday evening at Mount Holyoke's Chapin Auditorium, she gave a 90–minute concert for what seemed to be several hundred of her closest friends.

While many — including this writer — have chided Cole as being stiff and unexciting on record, the Rockport native and graduate of Berklee College of Music is clearly at home on a concert stage in front of a live audience. She revels in the context of performing live, breathing new life into mostly bland studio recordings.

Whether she was wistfully playing a clarinet or recklessly flailing away on the piano, Cole grabbed her music by the reins Sunday and emboldened nearly every song with a sense of urgency and vigor. She distanced herself from her Lilith Fair colleagues by daring to have her own personality. This combination of earnestness and her own compelling persona created a winning mix for Cole.

Instead of the unbearable blandness that plagues her contemporaries Jewel and Sarah McLachlan, Cole is not afraid to stand out and be her own woman, mind–boggling body contortions and all. With cheery over–the–top antics (at one point, a piano playing drag queen took center–stage) and a welcomed absence of inane pitter–patter, Cole's approach, while visceral at times ("Mississippi"), still managed to focus on everyday human emotions.

While a few songs ("Carmen," "Feelin' Love") meandered a bit too long and included some unnecessary guitar heroics, Cole never lost her focus or enthusiasm. Like P.J. Harvey, Cole is a woman possessed on stage, literally feeling each note and every word she utters. It all provides the audience with a mesmerizing experience, filled with a little yin and plenty of yang.

The evening's high point came early, during two powerfully emotional songs she performed behind the piano. Singing about the tender pain of growing up in a small town, "Bethlehem" (off her first album, Harbinger) revealed Cole's childhood of poverty and self–consciousness while "Tiger" was a personal declaration of independence from her past, "...I've left Bethlehem and I feel free/ I've left the girl I was supposed to be."

The only real disappointment of the night was "Where Have All the Cowboys Gone?" which Cole mistakenly turned into a perverse anti–men rant, complete with Michael Jackson–like gesticulations.

After returning to play the obvious encore "I Don't Want to Wait," Cole shuffled off for a costume change.

Making a dramatic reappearance, she closed with the French love song "Le Vie en Rose." Taking another page out of Harvey's playbook, she played the part of vixen–well, dressed in a blonde wig and a black scarf.

Fun? Sure. Entertaining? You betcha. The greatest show on earth? Not quite.

Kristin's death gives "Days" a boost

Hi soap fans, you'll have to excuse me if I appear to sound a bit disturbed but I'm still reeling from last Friday's ladies' figure skating finals and more to the point, the fact that I missed them entirely ("sulk"). What's even more upsetting is that the little jumping bean ended up snatching the gold medal from Michelle Kwan (my fave). Just joking... I'm sure Tara was just as deserving, if not more, of the gold (biting my lip). Oh well, as Kwan would say, "c'est la vie!"

The big to-do of last week was, by far, Kristin's death (big question mark here) on "Days of Our Lives." In case you missed it, John and Marlena burst into Kristin's penthouse only to find her lifeless body floating in the pool. Who killed her remains a mystery, a mystery that promises to be one of the soap's most exciting stories of the year (couldn't "Days" use one right about now?)

Jacob Fanning

The suspects include Laura (distraught over the "death" of her daughter at the hands of the DiMera's), Susan (last we saw of Kristin she was in a heated battle with Susan), but the real wild card in this is... Celeste. She's the perfect candidate given her state of mind (she's been inflicted with the "jungle madness" disease... don't ask).

The thing is, I'm not convinced that the corpse is actually that of Kristin's. It could just as easily be Susan lying face first in the pool. Rest assured though that with "Days," almost anything is possible (which makes the story such a coup). Ding, dong, the witch is dead (sniff). What will I do without her! The other big to-do's last week involved "Another World" and "General Hospital."

On last Friday's episode of "AW," Shane and Michael died in a car accident (as usual, Vicky was in the thick of it). As far as Shane goes, good riddance. May his character do in death what he couldn't in life, namely generate a worthwhile storyline.

As for "General Hospital," Lizzie's rape is turning out to be one of the most tragic rape storyline's since Marty's on "One Life To Live."

Becky Hearst (Liz) has proven herself to be one hell of an actress. Bravo to her performance last week. Rumor is, one of "GH"'s most popular (at one time) could be behind it.

I thought, with the mass influx of so-called male studs these past few weeks, I'd discuss two of the most recent additions to the male hoochie club (one that's working and one that's not). Listen, I understand the need to cast a fine looking lady or gent (generally, I don't complain) in the role of a leading man or woman but could we find someone with a little substance.

Daytime has made some strides in this department recently — hiring talent, not just beauty or preferably a mix of both (hence Tyler Christopher). But, for every step they take forward, they go and blow it by hiring some generic looking dope. In all fairness though, maybe the execs are hoping that they'll eventually find their footing and mature, as an actor. It's been known to happen before.

Let's take the recent hiring of "so and so" (I forget his name) as Cassie's ex, Rob, on "Guiding Light." I know he has only been on for a few weeks and that he's relatively new to daytime but his performance has been little more than a cold read. Sure he's got his fair share of ahem... assets (as my "GL" friend often points out) but the role needs more than that. He's new, so I'm just going to chalk it up to "inexperience" and give it a few more weeks. In his defense though, he definitely has this intensity to him. Let's see if he can capitalize on it.

With Cameron Mathison (Ryan), however, what he lacks in experience, he makes up for with charisma and charm. He's actually holding up quite well and showing some unexpected potential. Throwing him in with Kelsey's quest for Scott (in what is turning out to be this year's most exciting quadrangle) doesn't hurt either. I found myself pulling for the guy. Sure, he does a number on my ego (all these guys do) but he can stay. Generally, a pretty face won't be enough to get you the job anymore (despite the cliché). If the chemistry and performance isn't there to back it up, you're history. Don't believe me, just ask Leslie Horan (Miranda on "GH").

This week's quote of the week belong's to a random "GH" fan who sat behind me at the Blue Wall during an episode of "GH"...

In a scene with Nikolas and Robin (standing outside of Wyndamere in the middle of winter), directed to Nik.

"Just shut up and take off your shirt." It was hilarious. I mean, I hear guys say that all the time but very rarely do I hear it from a woman. I think it's about time. She didn't say anything most of my female "GH" pals weren't thinking.

In a little news... The Soap Opera Digest Awards are on this week (Feb. 27 at 9 p.m. on NBC). Be sure to watch! Be sure to catch "Port Charles" this week too as Lucy fights for her life. Should be good (does Lynn Herring ever disappoint?). Look for Maria to make a three–day return engagement to "All My Children" beginning March 27 (it won't be as a ghost). Look for the truth about Cassie to come out soon on "Young & the Restless." The soap has also announced plans for a future primetime episode. I'll keep you posted.

Sink or Swim:

Sink:

• Carly and Hal on "As the World Turns." After Jack turned down her marriage proposal (she's on a deadline) Carly goes running to Hal,- who's set on marrying her himself. Don't do it Carly!

• To Hayley's overly dramatic monologue on "All My Children" as she tried to pull Mateo out of his coma. You have to give Kelley Ripa credit for trying to pull it off though.

Swim:

• Annie's scheme on "Sunset Beach." Watching her drug Olivia and trying to induce labor with the intention of stealing her child... is there anything this woman won't do for money?

• Meow of the week is a tie between Bo and Kate on "Days" and Robin and Carly on "General Hospital." Their little catty confrontations last week made for some interesting moments.

• Annie's last stand on "Guiding Light." Reva and here have shared some classic moments over the years but this was one of the best, kidnapping Reva and throwing her in a plane that's headed for disaster. I'd expect nothing less from Annie. She's certainly set a new low for vixens everywhere during her stint.

Palmetto showcases a new Shue

By Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

PALMETTO
Directed by Volker Schlondorff with Woody Harrelson, Elisabeth Shue, Gina Gershon
Playing at Mountain Farms Theaters

With her blond hair, big brown eyes, and inviting smile, Elisabeth Shue has girl–next–door written all over her. In films like The Karate Kid, Back to the Future, and Adventures in Babysitting, Shue played characters that were so down–to–earth that even mom would be suspicious if you brought her home for dinner.

It's a big surprise, then, when Shue saunters her way into a bar in Palmetto, the new film noir set in the steamy Florida town of the same name. Swinging her full–figured body and flirting with come–hither looks, the Academy Award–winning actress has come a long way from playing soccer with Ralph Macchio.

In Palmetto, Shue's the femme fatale, camping her way through the delicious setting with an evil sensuality; she's the most ridiculous character in a movie with plenty of ridiculous contrivances.

Woody Harrelson's Harry Barber, framed for a crime he didn't commit, is finally released from prison after a testimony of an ex–cop clears his name. Harrelson returns to the Florida seaside town Palmetto and reunites with his girlfriend (Gina Gershon), but his bitterness remains. When the seductive Shue enters his life, her offers are understandably hard to turn down.

Shue's Rhea Malroux character, the greedy wife of a rich, old business man, hatches a fake kidnapping plan involving her stepdaughter Odette (Chloe Sevigny), who's rebellious enough herself. The reason for this is something to the effect of $500,000, of which Harry gets a healthy sum for carrying the scheme out. Any doubts Harry has are quickly forgotten when Shue leans seductively against his window.

Of course, everything that could go wrong does, and part of the fun is watching Harry get out–played and out–thought by every character in the film. Harrelson does a superb job of looking perplexed and acting stupid.

In fact, the best parts of Palmetto are moments of self– parody. Shue takes a cigarette but doesn't smoke; Harrelson orders bourbon and doesn't drink it. But he still manages to burn himself and bump into things repeatedly.

Palmetto really takes off when Harry is hired to be the police liaison to the press — the kidnapper himself becomes the D.A.'s right–hand man, and the film deliciously plays with this complex. Meanwhile, more twists and turns are in order; by the end, even a killer liquid substance that seems to be on loan from Who Framed Roger Rabbit? figures into the picture.

But under the direction of Volker Schlondorff, we get Palmetto the satire, Palmetto the steamy film noir, and Palmetto the late night erotic thriller you find on HBO. The screenplay by E. Maxe Frye, based on the novel by James Hadley Chase, tries too often to mirror classic Hollywood thrillers like The Big Sleep and Body Heat. Frye gives annoyingly serious voice–over narration to Harrelson and "90210"–like dialogue to Shue; the most interesting character in the film, meanwhile, Sevigny's conniving stepdaughter, is disposed of much too quickly.

Big mistakes lie in casting — Gershon, always great as the volatile badgirl, is forced to play nice and has little to do. The same goes for the goofy Michael Rapaport, portraying the tough bad guy, he doesn't do much better than Barney Rubble would. Sometimes typecasting is a good thing.

But at least Palmetto has some spark, unlike the cockroach the camera constantly focuses on, it loves the light as much as the dark. Colorful characters — both smart and dumb — mix well with the stark heat and steamy rain–soaked town that Harrelson's Harry Barber finds himself falling victim to once again. As Harry's nemesis warns him late in the movie, "If you're going to jump in the deep end, you better know how to swim." Palmetto's stroke isn't always smooth, but it has its moments. B–

Horoscopes

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — Concentrate on doing for others something that was done for you some time ago. You can return the favor by starting a tradition.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Take care you don't let your own nervousness taint your interaction with those who are far more easygoing at this time. Stay calm!

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You may have to repeat yourself today in order to be sure that others are understanding what you have to say. Don't get frustrated.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — What you thought would be a short-term commitment is likely to require far more from you in the way of long-term involvement. Prepare yourself.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You shouldn't have trouble progressing according to plan today. Focus on what brings you the most immediate profit.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — It is important for you to understand completely how you fit into the overall scheme of things at this time. Find out what your role really is.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Someone near you may be expecting more from you than you are willing to give at first. Do not overreact; avoid knee-jerk responses.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — A close friend or ally may not agree with your methods at this time, but he or she is willing to go the distance for old-time's sake.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You mustn't take improper advantage of someone else's generosity and willingness to be involved today. Ask only what you would ask of others.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — An interruption early in the day may be nothing more than an annoyance at first, but later you'll realize its true significance.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — An early start today will allow you the freedom later on to decide with greater clarity just where you wish to turn. You have a big decision to make.

AQUARIUS (Jan 20.–Feb. 18) — Others are likely to rally around you today in support of an idea that came to you very recently. Already it's catching on, however!

UMass beat defending champion Virginia Tech who tallied 111, while Rhode Island repeated their performance with 103 points, good for third. La Salle placed fourth with 75.50, followed by St. Joseph's (60), Dayton (55), Temple (22), Duquesne (14). Fordham finished last with 10 points in the field of nine.

Leading the pack for the Minutewomen was senior Shana Mitchell who captured the 20-pound weight throw with a toss of 51'05.50". Senior Rosey Bryan was victorious in the triple jump with a leap of 39'01.75". The 1000m winning time of 2:55.94 was amassed by junior Nicole Way. The UMass squad of seniors Emma Gardiner, Christy Martin, Way, and freshman Melissa Henderson also won the medley relay in a time of 12:20.06. Sophomore Sally Hirsch placed third in the 3,000m in 10:14.93.

Rhode Island was dominating for much of the sprints as Tiffany Adams was victorious in the 55m dash with a time of 7.18. UMass' Bryan placed second, followed by teammate Jamie Hedgecock who placed third with a time of 7.32 and 7.34 seconds, respectively. Michelle Trefz placed first in the 200m dash for the Rams (26.32).

Dayton's Kaamilya Davis won the 400m dash in 55.70 seconds. UMass was well represented in this one by Sillfa Kenku who finished second with a time of 57.41. URI's Amy Taylor came in third at 57.46.

Bryan also placed second in the 55m hurdles behind Trefz with a time of 8.01. Trefz won with a sub-eight second time of 7.99.

Massachusetts reigned in the long jump despite Virginia Tech's Megan Barnes first place jump of 18'07.25". Shelanda Irish placed second with 18'06.00". Bryan followed with a jump of 18'05.75", while Melanie Bell finished the UMass trio with 17'06.75".

Rhode Island's Stephanie Maughan captured the pole vault title with a distance of 9'05.75".

Virginia Tech proved their depth as they consistently placed in the top four spots in many of the events despite only having two top-place finishers.

Katie Ollendick won the high jump with an even 6'00.00" leap. The Hokie's Megan Barnes outlasted the field to win the long jump with 18'07.25".

They placed three of the top six finishers in the 55m hurdles, while they also dominated the 20-pound weight with two of the top four finishers.

Women's gymnastics falls second to W. Virginia

By Justin Rudd

A perfect 10.00 was scored. It would seem to be the highlight for the winning team. Yet it just wasn't enough of a push for the No. 25 Massachusetts womens gymnastics team in their attempt to beat undefeated No. 9 West Virginia. UMass eventually fell by a score of 195.300–193.075.

This past Friday, the Minutewomen played host to the West Virginia Mountaineers and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology Engineers in a 7:30 p.m. tri-meet at the Curry Hicks Cage.

Leading the pack for UMass was freshman phenom Jill Fisher. The New York native attempted to rejuvenate her fellow Minutewomen late in the match by scoring an unprecedented perfect 10.00 on the floor exercise. But despite her valiant efforts, UMass could not pull off the win. West Virginia just had too much depth for the Minuutewomen.

The headliner for the Mountaineers was junior Jessica Nonnemacher. Coming out of Reading, Pa., Nonnemacher was impressive with her performance in all three of her participating events. The junior finished second on the floor with a career-high tying 9.95, and fourth on the uneven bars with a 9.775. Most notably, she tied the West Virginia school record with a 9.925 on the balance beam.

When it came to highlights for M.I.T., the Engineers stand-out was freshman Sonja Ellefson. Regardless to the Enginners' third place finish, the Minnesota native stepped it up by breaking two individual records, including one M.I.T. record. Ellefson broke her individual records in both the vault and the balance beam with matching scores of 9.5. She also broke the all-around record fro MIT with a 37.45.

Not much Brotherly Love for Larry Brown, 76ers

Before the 1997-98 campaign began, Philadelphia 76ers management thought they had the answer to their problems. Larry Brown, a veteran coach who has made winners out of everybody he's ever guided, inked a contract with the Sixers to help a team that was in desperate need of some direction.

He had the tools to work with. Plenty of talent, but needed a chemist to preach the idea of cooperation. In Allen Iverson, he had instant offense and solid on-the-ball defense. Jerry Stackhouse could put points on the board and Derrick Coleman supplied some inside punch.

It seemed as though the Sixers were only a coach away from molding this talent into an actual team.

After Sunday's 97-92 home loss to his former team, the Pacers, Brown absorbed his 35th loss of the season, against 17 wins. It has to be tough for Brown, considering the glory years he had as a player in both the college and pro ranks.

Brown has a lot of say in Philly trade affairs, but it's hard to see Brown in owner Pat Croce's office, begging for his consent to shoot for Joe Smith.

Granted, Smith is a great player. But in Golden State, who a couple years back was a carbon copy of this year's Sixer bunch, Smith was an individual who wanted to play an individual's game. While at Maryland, he was it. He was the Associated Press Player of the Year as a sophomore, putting up stellar numbers. Heading into the National Basketball Association, he wanted more of that. Once he became a Warrior, coach P.J. Carlesimo had that same individual on his squad.

Now with Smith in a Sixer uniform, more unruly talent comes to the City of Brotherly Love. In addition, to acquire Smith, the Sixers bid farewell to the well-rounded Clarence Weatherspoon.

Not being able to select Tim Duncan was a huge setback for the Sixers, but then again, he was everybody's answer. In this year's draft, which most labelled a weak class of seniors and underclassmen, Brown needed a player who could be a team player with a good attitude. He might have had it in Keith Van Horn, but that was short-lasted, dealing the Ute in a post-draft day deal with New Jersey and their draftee Tim Thomas.

Great. More of that.

Brett Mauser is a Collegian columnist.

The bottom line is that Philadelphia is going nowhere fast. Each year on paper the Sixers look like they're finally ready to bust out of their funk. But year in and year out, they disappoint, representing the classic underachievers.

Trading for Smith made no sense. He was simply more of what Philadelphia already had, lottery picks who enjoy filling stat sheets rather than the win column.

Are these players coachable? Come June, when college hopefuls congregate at Madison Square Garden, war rooms might want to gaze deeper into the crystal ball while keeping the misfortune of the 76ers in mind.

I guess you can't have everything in Denver these days. The Broncos are on top, the Avalanche are once again title contenders, the Rockies finally have a pitching staff, and the Nuggets, well, they're the Nuggets.

You have to figure that there would be no place like Denver for a sports fan. But the Denver Nuggets could put a sour taste in what has been nothing but the sweetest of victory for the Big D (sorry Dallas).

At 5-49, the Nuggets would have to double their victory total in half the time. The 1972-73 76ers squad has to be holding their breath, for their futility might in fact be bettered. Coach Bill Hanzlik didn't know what he had to work with, or more fittingly, what he didn't have.

Dealing Antonio McDyess to Phoenix in a three-way deal with the Cavaliers was probably a mistake, but those in Denver were on the right page. They were thinking of the future, rather than the now.

With an assortment of draft picks received in the McDyess deal, the Nuggets see a bright light at the end of the tunnel. Right now, that bright light's the headlights of a train, but in a few years, that light could be transformed into some hope.

With a solid young nucleus in Bobby Jackson, Eric Washington, Tony Battie, Danny Fortson, and Eric Williams, and an assortment of draft picks to come, the Nuggets might have the last laugh.

If it's luck, well, call them lucky. But you have to believe that Bill Hanzlik and Co. had this genius theory dreamt up from the beginning. Management at its best.

Hoop leads A–10 as NCAAs approach

By Corey Peter Goodman
Collegian Staff

The college basketball world opened their eyes last season when the Atlantic 10 sent five teams to the NCAA tournament. Once considered just the stomping ground for Massachusetts, the A–10 gathered to dethrone the Minutemen last season, ending their five–year dominance atop the conference.

This season, however, the A–10 has proven itself to be one of the power-house conferences in the country. And when Selection Sunday arrives on March 8, at least six A–10 schools will be expecting to hear their names called as part of the field of 64.

The teams include Massachusetts (20–7), Temple (18–6), Rhode Island (19–7), Xavier (18–6), George Washington (20– 6) and Dayton (18–9).

With two weeks remaining until Judgement Day, the A–10 is gearing up for the final week of its regular season and the conference tourney (March 4–7). With a pair of top seeds still up for grabs in each division, and with six teams battling for them, the league is preparing itself for the most exciting finish in recent years.

Massachusetts (12–2 A–10), which sits in first place in the East division, is only a half–game ahead of second–place Temple (11–5) and two games in front of Rhode Island (10–4).

The Minutemen, who jumped out to a perfect 8–0 mark in league play, have faltered of late. They were embarrassed two weeks ago against Temple, and then dropped a double– overtime decision to Rhode Island last Wednesday. But UMass squeaked out an overtime victory against St. Joseph's on Saturday, ensuring the team's first 20–win season in the Bruiser Flint–era.

Lari Ketner is the Minutemen's big man in the middle. Leading the team with 15 points a game and 7.5 rebounds, the junior is among the best centers in the league and the nation.

First–year guard Monty Mack is second on the team with 13.9 points, and junior Charlton Clarke is the clutch shooter and emotional leader for UMass.

UMass has a date in Olean, N.Y. tomorrow to battle St. Bonaventure (15–12, 5–9), before finishing up at Temple on Sunday. The matchup with the Owls will decide which school gets the top seed in the tourney, and a bye on the opening night. Temple will likely be the favorite. The Owls have been the most dominant team in the entire league since dismantling UMass on Feb. 3. Over that stretch, the Owls — boasting the league's top defense — have won seven straight including huge road victories at Rhode Island (Feb. 14) and George Washington (Feb. 22).

Rasheed Brokenborough is arguably the most explosive guard in the league, and Pepe Sanchez leads the conference in steals with 3.7 per game. Center Lamont Barnes, considered one of the most improved players in the conference, is among the best in both rebounds (8.3 per game) and blocked shots (2.46 per game).

Rhode Island (10–4) is two games behind UMass, and a game and a half behind Temple. The Rams host Xavier tonight, and then finish the season against the Fordham Rams (5–19, 1–13) on Saturday.

The Rams have the league's best point guard in senior Tyson Wheeler. He leads the A–10 in assists (6.15 per game) and is among top leaders in scoring (14.5 points per game). With his numbers, Wheeler is among the favorites for A–10 Player of the Year.

Who would have thought the Dayton Flyers would be sitting atop the A–10 West Division this late in the season? The Flyers (10–4) might be the most improved team in the A–10, and owe it to A–10 Player of the Year candidate Ryan Perryman. The forward leads the Flyers with

Men's track 5th at Champs

By Seth Koenig

In a meet for which the Massachusetts men's indoor track team's coaching staff had predicted several possible outcomes, everything went according to plan.

Unfortunately.

Before the Atlantic 10 Championships at the University of Rhode Island in Kingston, UMass coach Ken O'Brien and his assistants worked out the scores with a handful of different scenarios. In each and every one of them, the Virginia Tech Hokies were expected to win the meet handily.

"Virginia Tech was not to be beaten, and we knew that going in," O'Brien said.

Indeed, the Hokies scored 215.5 points, destroying the competition. The second place team, LaSalle, had a relatively distant 98.5. The Minutemen came in fifth place with 63 points. They followed Rhode Island, who scored 83, and St. Joseph's, who scored 72. The second through fifth overall places at the meet were up for grabs, according to the Massachusetts coaches' predictions.

"The second place team scored around 90, the third place team scored around 80, the fourth place team scored around 70, and so on," O'Brien said. "We hoped to be between second and fifth. I was disappointed; we had hoped for second, but ended up at the bottom of those four teams.

"I would say it was a day of mixed results in what we did and what we had hoped to do."

Aside from the overall heartbreak of performing how they half expected they might, there were some spectacular individual showings by the Minutemen.

For the second consecutive year, junior Albie Vasquez brought home the conference pole vault championship. By clearing 14'9", Vasquez managed to hold back Virginia Tech's talented vaulting combo of Nathan Bath and

Croat-Muslim tensions still flaring in Bosnia

MOSTAR, Bosnia-Herzegovina — Police closed down the road that splits the divided southern city of Mostar today after a bomb was thrown at a cafe and seven cars were stoned.

As a result of Monday's violence, the Boulevard of Revolution — Mostar's unofficial dividing line between its Croat and Muslim halves - was closed for traffic by the police of the Muslim-Croat federation.

Initial allies against Bosnian Serbs, Bosnian Croats and Muslims turned against each other in 1993 and fought for a year for territories in central and southern Bosnia.

Under strong international pressure, they joined a shaky federation in 1994. But ethnic mistrust has persisted ever since, fueled by hardliners on both sides. The de-facto division of Mostar is a stark symbol of that mistrust.

U.N spokesman Alexander Ivanko said it is "too early to say" what provoked the violence. But there was speculation that recent comments by Croatian President Franjo Tudjman could have stoked Bosnian Croat and Muslim animosities.

Man executed in Montana murder trial

DEER LODGE, Mont. — A drifter who came to Montana to become a mountain man and wound up murdering a couple was executed this morning, taking any hope of an explanation for the killings to his grave.

In the nine years Terry Allen Langford was on death row, he never said why he tied up and killed Ned and Celene Blackwood at their ranch home in 1988. The question haunted him as well, his aunt said.

"He said, 'Every day I lay my head on the pillow, I ask myself what happened,'" said Brenda Prangley, who spoke with Langford frequently by phone.

Langford, 31, was executed by injection after nine years of swinging back and forth between resignation and court appeals. Within hours of his arrest in 1988, he had confessed and requested the death penalty, but as late as Monday night he asked Gov. Marc Racicot for a delay. It was denied.

It was only the state's second execution since 1943.

The North Carolina cabinetmaker had planned to live in the wilderness of the Rocky Mountains but stumbled on the Blackwoods' home. He raided their garage refrigerator, found a loaded

.22-caliber rifle in Blackwood's truck and forced Mrs. Blackwood to tie her husband's hands. Then he tied both of them up in the living room and talked with them for several hours as they lay captive. "There was a point where they were getting along fine," said Chris Prangley, Langford's uncle. "He said they were really nice people."

Record number of candidates to run in SGA elections

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

A record number of candidates for the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) are running in the March 9 and 10 elections for trustee and president.

Chancellor of Elections Carlos Alvarez announced yesterday that 13 candidates are running in the SGA elections.

Alvarez announced another referendum question which will be added to the ballot, in addition to the two referenda questions already on the ballot.

Two questions on the ballot are asking students if the 24- hour card access pilot program in the Orchard Hill and Southwest Residential areas has increased security or if it should be abandoned.

The third question will ask students if basketball tickets should be general admission, reserved seating or a mixture of both.

Alvarez promised strict enforcement of the codes that guide candidate's behavior. If the 13 candidates do not follow rules governing their campaigns there will be consequences, he said.

"If any of the people running break any of the codes they are bound by for the election, their candidacy will be nullified," Alvarez said.

Alvarez stressed that greater numbers of votes will be needed because the large number of candidates might divide the number of student votes.

"I think it would be nice to get more voters out there. It makes the difference in choice a lot clearer," Alvarez said.

Alvarez stressed that president and trustee are important positions and students should voice their opinion of who they support through voting.

"One vote could decide [the election] either way. There should be more of a difference to show what the people really want. There should be a bigger difference between candidates for [important positions like] president or trustee," Alvarez said.

SGA President Lia Wong stressed that voting for trustee and president is an important way for students to make themselves heard.

"Students need to voice their own opinions. Voting is the least they can do to be heard. It takes five minutes out of their day to have their voices heard," Wong said.

Brian Tirrell, current Student Trustee describes the responsibility and authority of the position.

"The Student Trustee is a representative of the students to the Board of Trustees. You have a responsibility to develop a sense [of the priorities of students] of the five campuses," Tirrell said.

SGA President Lia Wong said the president's job is to represent the student body in its entirety.

Coed wrestling club looks to form RSO

By Jason Eiseman

Women who wish to wrestle are welcome to join the new wrestling club featuring coed wrestling, as student athletes work to have the club recognized as a Registered Student Organization (RSO).

Freshman biology major Olivia Cabrera was inspired to create the wrestling club after she was not allowed to participate in an intramural wrestling tournament at Boyden Gym. There were no other girls wrestling and after weighing her in tournament officials would not allow her to wrestle with the men.

Cabrera wrestled her junior and senior year in high school.

"The coach was all for it. I think the coach was more enthusiastic than I was," Cabrera said.

She said wasn't trying to make a statement; she did it for the love of the sport.

"I wasn't out there to prove anything. I was just out there to wrestle," Cabrera said.

According to Cabrera, an opposing coach was not in favor of her wrestling against his team.

Two Amherst women travel to Washington in protest

By Samantha Poulton
Collegian Staff

In response to President Clinton's recent announcement that the United States is preparing to conduct air strikes against Iraq, two Amherst women traveled to Washington this past weekend to picket and protest Clinton's decision in front of the White House.

Tara McCarthy and Erica Plouffe, both 23, feel that force is never the only answer when negotiating with other countries.

"We feel that diplomacy hasn't been taken far enough," McCarthy, a non-profit advocate, said. "The United States should continue to try to negotiate with Iraq."

McCarthy and Plouffe said they woke up last Thursday and realized that they had no choice but to go to Washington. The women feel the President should be made aware that many Americans do not believe in a war with Iraq, as shown by the protest last week in Ohio.

"My hope is that the president hears the many voices opposing war, and that more Americans speak their opinions — loudly," McCarthy said.

Plouffe, a reporter, said that military action is unnecessary, and diplomatic measures which could put an end to this crisis have not been taken far enough.

"I hope [Americans] will not be forced to gather around our televisions to learn about the horrors the United States caused because it wouldn't give a little for the sake of diplomacy and world peace," Plouffe said.

McCarthy and Plouffe, both feel strongly that diplomacy should not be abandoned and on Saturday joined a rally in front of the White House.

McCarthy and Plouffe protested alone late Saturday, and all day Sunday and Monday.

In addition to picketing, McCarthy and Plouffe gathered signatures and support from the people in the Amherst community.

Petitions were posted at many local area businesses, including Food For Thought Bookstore and Collective Copies. The women also invited President Jimmy Carter, who has vocalized his opposition to bombing Iraq, to place his signature among the many others on the list.

They linked all the signatures together in a giant scroll to bring to Washington. In addition to the signatures from Amherst, many new ones were added from tourists and people rallying around the White House.

They even got a chance to show their signs to the president. They believe he got their message.

"We were walking by the back door of the White House, when suddenly President Clinton came walking out the door to walk his dog, Buddy," McCarthy said. "He noticed the large, red and purple signs we were holding, and waved to us."

McCarthy and Plouffe were happy about the most recent improvements in the Iraqi situation in which Iraq has promised to let United Nations inspectors in to their country. However, the women will still continue with their activism to ensure that more people don't suffer.

"Not lifting the sanctions on Iraq means the real losers here are the Iraqi people," McCarthy said. "They are the ones who are suffering."

U.S. seeks clarity in Iraqi agreement

By Susan Sevareid
Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — Secretary-General Kofi Annan briefed the Security Council for two hours yesterday on his weapons inspection agreement with Iraq, and the U.S. ambassador emerged to say some details still need to be clarified.

The council did not immediately make a decision on the accord struck by Annan in a visit to Baghdad — an agreement he called "a victory for the United Nations."

But U.S. Ambassador Bill Richardson said it could take a few days to get the clarifications the United States seeks.

"We believe that this agreement is a step in the right direction, but we need some clarifications in some of the language in the agreement," Richardson said.

The U.S. ambassador would not say when he expected a special team to inspect Iraqi presidential palaces to be in place. Annan had been upbeat going into the closed Security Council meeting.

"I think we have a good agreement, an agreement that I will defend anywhere, and I'm sure the member states would accept it," he told about 700 U.N. employees pressed against blue metal barriers to congratulate the secretary-general on his mission to Iraq.

"There were millions of people around the world rooting for peace," Annan told the whistling and applauding U.N. staff. "That is why I say you should never underestimate the power of prayer." Annan thanked President Clinton and British Prime Minister Tony Blair "for being perfect U.N. peacekeepers — U.N. peacekeepers in the sense that we taught our peacekeepers that the best way to use force is to show it in order not to have to use it."

Mindful of past broken promises by Saddam Hussein, the Clinton administration said it wants the agreement to be tested. Richardson said the question "is going be how we enforce this agreement." The ambassador said that after Security Council approval of Annan's agreement, "we have to test it, then we have to enforce it and then we have to find ways to make sure there is full compliance." He said the test should be "quick."

A U.S. concern during the council meeting was who would head up the "special group" that is to be created to carry out inspections of the eight presidential sites at the heart of the latest standoff, according to a Western diplomat who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Creative students may be rewarded

The Chancellor's Counsel on Community, Diversity and Social Justice is currently soliciting innovative proposals for educational activities and programs at the University of Massachusetts.

"This is an effort to provide incentives to innovative people on campus," Grant Ingle, Director of the Office of Human Relations said.

Now in its sixth year, this program distributes between ten and fifteen thousand dollars each year, some taken from alumni contributions, to support creative ways of fostering community on campus.

"This program provides those with an idea the funding to make things happen," Ingle said.

Approximately twenty to twenty-five applications are received each year, with ten to twelve groups receiving awards.

The awards are given to groups or individuals to fund forums, workshops, outreach activities and similar endeavors to promote connections between different groups on campus.

"It's bringing together people who may not have connected before. The object is to build community by making connections," Ingle said.

Award criteria consists of a number of proposed activities: bringing together persons from two or more communities or constituencies in a joint activity, demonstrating collaboration of communities or constituencies in the proposal planning process, promoting mutual respect and understanding on the campus or in the larger community, representing new programs or collaborating partnerships as opposed to annual programs or continuations of past projects, and completing the projects by the end of the fall 1998 semester.

The requests for proposals are being released in the spring, according to Ingle, because many more are planned in the fall and run in the spring. This will allow for planning in the spring and more programming for the fall semester.

Awards range from $250 to $1, 500, with all awards this year expected to total $10,000.

Kevin Powell, former senior writer for Vibe Magazine and author of the book, Keepin' It Real: Post MTV Reflections on Race, Sex and Politics, said that things aren't going to get much better for this country, with regards to race relations and poverty, unless people learn to connect.

"I believe in the Harriet Tubman theory," Powell said in a lecture at Mt. Holyoke College this past Monday. "I want to go back and get as many people as I can and bring 'em out."

Powell, who first gained national attention on MTV's "The Real World (New York)," stressed the importance and need for people to connect and make things happen.

"If we give lip service to living in a multicultural society, if we say that we want to have a diverse society, don't you think it's going to take a little bit of work?" Powell inquired. abide by the agreement, a sense of relief pervaded Washington as Clinton tentatively accepted Baghdad's written promise to allow full U.N. weapons inspections.

However, Clinton ordered the U.S. military force in the Persian Gulf to remain in case Iraq reneges again. Ground and air forces continued to arrive today even as the threat of conflict eased. Clinton vowed the United States would be "watching very closely" to see if Iraq carries out the agreement.

"Let there be no doubt we must remain committed to see that Saddam Hussein does not menace the world with weapons of mass destruction," Clinton said yesterday.

Under the accord signed Monday, Iraq would give the U.N. Special Commission that oversees inspections and the International Atomic Energy Agency "immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access" to suspected weapons sites as required by past U.N. resolutions. However, the two-page memo stipulated that senior diplomats appointed by Annan, along with experts from UNSCOM and IAEA, would carry out inspections at eight presidential palaces.

Secretary of State Madeleine Albright insisted yesterday that U.N. inspectors must remain in control of the search for Iraqi weapons if the agreement is to stand.

Albright told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that these terms "may be acceptable if the inspectors are free to conduct rigorous and professional inspections."

Panther documentary spurs discussion and awareness of civil rights

By Aimee Wallis
Collegian Correspondent

Heated discussion took place Monday night in the University of Massachusetts Campus Center following a documentary on mutinous movements by members of the Black Panthers to reform American government in the late '60s and early '70s.

The two hour documentary titled All Power to the People, sponsored by Friends of the Revolutionary Anti-Imperialist League (RAIL) and Maoist Internationalist Movement (MIM) depicted the physical and verbal actions taken by African-American men and women during the Black Panthers surge and the toll it has had on Americans to this day.

Nine of the 17 who attended the documentary stayed for the discussion following. Different views were thrown back and forth on the topic of why African-Americans spoke out as they did 30 years ago. A RAIL representative stated that African-Americans do not want to be ruled by an almost all white government as whites would not want to be ruled by an almost all African-American government.

RAIL and MIM supporters are from all races and support each other in the opinion that the government throws citizens in jail for stating their political beliefs and demonstrating actions. The discussion covered supporters' views on whites and blacks benefits in a "colonial" government as we have in America today. Students agreed that whites are benefitting from oppression. For example, whites have better chances at receiving mortgages and schooling.

The Black Panthers were a revolutionary group of African- Americans that struggled for self-determination and liberation from American imperialism. The Black Panthers no longer exist, however, new groups such as RAIL and MIM have developed to raise awareness of those imprisoned and to one day set them free.

RAIL is open to any person who believes in self- perseverance for all, regardless of race or color, and supports the need of an armed struggle against imperialism. MIM strives to end oppression of all groups including classes, genders and nations.

This week RAIL and MIM are raising awareness of the imprisonment of some of the members of the Black Panther activists. Their goal is to free prisoners who have been incarcerated for their political views that they have acted upon.

Monday night was the beginning of a week-long cognizance at UMass to alert students of the Black Panthers and their current imprisonment. Information sessions will be held this week and next week on campus to inform students of imprisonment and to encourage them to attend a March to End Imprisonment on March 27 in Washington D.C. Representatives from numerous national liberation movements will be speaking tonight on the imprisonment of their insurgent leaders at the UMass Campus Center 905 Forum.

and the importance for people of color to read and be informed beyond what's taught in the classroom.

"I think about my education, K-12th grade, and how little I learned about the contributions of black people to American life," said Powell, who was invited by Mt. Holyoke to speak at their final Black History event for the month. "My mother, like a lot of people who were a part of that era before the Civil Rights, felt that the best education was to get an integrated education."

"There's nothing wrong with going to school with people of different backgrounds, but I do think there's something wrong when the education is not diverse," Powell said.

Growing up in poverty, Powell's mother had the equivalent of a fifth grade education, yet despite such limitations, she instilled a zest for learning in her children.

"My mom had to put me in public school, because we were poor," said Powell. "I couldn't afford to go to private school and now, as an adult, I thank God I didn't go to private school, because at least my mother didn't pay for me to be miseducated," Powell said.

It wasn't until he was 18-years-old and attending Rutgers University in New Jersey that Powell said he learned about the contributions that black people made to America.

"I thought it was incredible that I spent 18 years of my life not knowing about the greatness of my people and I was pissed off my four years in college," Powell said.

Powell attributes much of the problems that plague the black community, and other minority groups, to a lack of cultural awareness and history.

"If you don't learn about yourself, you're not going to appreciate yourself, you're not going to like yourself, and I would offer that you will hate yourself. And if you hate yourself, you're going to hate people who look like you. That ignorance breeds hatred," Powell explained.

Being no stranger to trouble and the realities of growing up poor, Powell admitted that he too, at one time, shared the same kind of self-destructive attitude that many of America's youth have today. Powell said it was reading The Autobiography of Malcolm X that changed his perspective on life.

"For the first time, when I read the autobiography, the experiences that I went through were being crystallized on paper, and it blew my mind," explained Powell. "That book really changed my life."

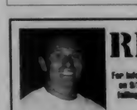
Malcolm X was an avid reader during his incarceration. So much so, that he would still read in the dark when it was time for "lights out." Powell wondered why many of the college students he comes across didn't share that same hunger for reading.

"If someone like him can read in the dark with a slit of light," said Powell, referring to the way Malcolm X would use the outside light coming in between his cell bars to see. "What's wrong with us?" Powell asked.

Powell encouraged students to really take an analytical approach to things that they do and say. He said that students need to realize the opportunity they have for growth.

"Do not take educational opportunities for granted," Powell said. "If you go into college one way, intellectually, and you go out the same way and you don't grow, intellectually, something is wrong with the education you just pumped 30- 40 thousand dollars a year for."

Aside from writing and lecturing around the country, Powell is co-founder, chairman and C.E.O. of a non-profit organization called Get Up On It, slated to begin as soon as funding for the program is complete. The program is geared toward raising the consciousness of black people.



"I basically just do what your theme is for Black History Month, which is Walk in the Spirit of Our Ancestors," Powell said.

South Korean leader to take oath of office

By Pauline Jelinek
Associated Press

SEOUL, South Korea — Power will pass to an opposition figure today for the first time in modern Korean history, when former democracy leader Kim Dae-jung takes the oath of office and begins his "government of the people."

Branded a dangerous radical for decades by successive military governments, Kim is promising political and economic reforms. "During my term of office, democracy and economy will go hand in hand," he has said.

He is to take the oath of office and promise a leaner, more responsive "government of the people" at a plaza in front of the National Assembly building.

Among the guests invited are former Philippines President Corazon Aquino, former German President Richard von Weizsaecker, Chairman Juan Antonio Samaranch of the International Olympic Committee and pop singer Michael Jackson.

Between the 1970s and late 1980s, he was variously jailed, exiled and held under house arrest for 15 years. He escaped at least three assassination attempts and a court sentence of death. Often called "Asia's Mandela" because of his personal ordeal and his call for reconciliation, the 74-year-old Kim comes to office with a public approval rating of around 90 percent. He has been virtually running the country since his election in December. The task demanding Kim's immediate attention is the economy, which nearly collapsed in December in a currency crisis brought on by massive debts among some of the nation's biggest conglomerates. The International Monetary Fund negotiated a record $57 billion bailout for South Korea. And under strict IMF prescriptions, inflation and unemployment are rising. By the end of this year, up to 1 million people are expected to lose their jobs.

But under Kim's pre-inauguration leadership, markets have stabilized significantly and foreign lenders have rolled over billions of dollars in maturing loans to the country.

Though he is the first president chosen from an opposition party since the country was formed in 1948, the victory was made possible by an alliance with former political foes. And his party still has a minority in the Parliament.

Still, political observers are predicting he will strengthen the nation's fledgling democracy, improve its human rights record and thaw long frozen relations with communist rival North Korea. Paik Seung-ki, a professor at Kyongwon University, compared Kim's situation with that of Franklin Roosevelt, who became U.S. president in 1933 at the height of the Great Depression.

"At least for the time being, he will be a happy president. In this crisis situation... all blame will go to his predecessor government," said Paik.

Mossad chief resigns over botched assassination

By Dafna Linzer
Associated Press

JERUSALEM — Israel's spy chief resigned yesterday over the botched assassination attempt against a Hamas leader in Jordan, a move Israel hoped would mend relations with its neighbor and restore some of the Mossad spy agency's lost luster.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu accepted the reluctant resignation of Danny Yatom, who had been sharply criticized in several inquiries into the failed Sept. 25 attempt on Hamas political leader Khalid Mashal.

The resignation was welcomed in Israel, as well as in Jordan. "A replacement needs to be found immediately so that the Mossad can begin to learn the lessons here and make the necessary changes," said Uzi Landau, who leads the Knesset committee on Israel's intelligence agencies.

Yatom's turn at the helm had been one of the lests glorious for an organization that achieved worldwide fame for daring successes — such as kidnapping Nazi leader Adolf Eichmann for trial and landing an agent in the top echelons of Syria in the 1960s, and tracking down and executing Palestinian terrorists in the 1970s.

The Mossad became a fixture in novels and movies of international intrigue. But in recent years it earned less flattering attention, such as in a 1990 book by former agent Victor Ostrovsky, who portrayed it as driven by "greed, lust and total lack of respect for human life."

Opposition lawmaker Hagai Merom described the Mashaal affair as "an earthquake for the Mossad" that exposed systemic failures in every level of the agency, from highest-level planning to execution in the field.

Mossad agents injected Mashaal with poison outside his office in Amman. But he survived and the agents were caught, forcing Israel to free Hamas founder Ahmed Yassin and 20 other Arab inmates to bring the agents back home. An outraged King Hussein then cut off security cooperation with the Jewish state, demanding Yatom's dismissal.

An investigative panel in Israel found that Yatom had not seriously considered the possibility of failure and had not prepared for it. The committee cleared Netanyahu of blame. The prime minister, seeking to avenge two Hamas suicide bombings in Jerusalem in July and September 1997, had given the final go-ahead for the operation. Opposition leaders have dismissed the panel's absolution of Netanyahu as a whitewash.

The agency's image suffered yet another blow several months ago when a former agent was indicted on charges that he concocted false reports about Syrian war intentions that reportedly sparked tensions between the two countries in 1980 and again in 1996. "The Mossad has fallen on hard times operationally, and procedures-wise, it's not ready for the 21st century," said Amir Oren, a columnist for the Haaretz daily.

■ wrestling club

However, after wrestling against one of his players, she earned respect.

"It's a fun sport, it teaches a lot," Cabrera said. "I think the interest is there. I don't think we're going to have a problem. People on campus wanted it, we're fulfilling what they want."

Frank Stryker, who is working with Cabrera to get the club started, thinks wrestling puts extra pressure on women who try to join a team.

Stryker encourages all women to join the club.

"It's harder for a girl, because a guy just tries to be more physical with a girl. But a girl can get bragging rights," Stryker said.

If a women is a good technical wrestler she has a good chance of beating a wrestler who tries to overpower her, he said.

Wrestling with other women involved in the club will be a new experience for Cabrera, who has only wrestled men.

However, getting their idea onto the mats is not cut and dry. In fact, the process of becoming an RSO can be a difficult one, as Cabrera and Stryker are finding out.

Heather Makes, a senior biology major, and the Secretary of the Registry of RSOs, said an application must be filed with the Student Government Association (SGA). If the SGA rejects an application, students can work on their application until it is approved.

Makes has the final word on whether an organization becomes an RSO; to approve an application, organizations submit mandatory information.

First, a list of members (all undergraduates) must be filed.

Makes said RSOs are allowed to have graduates and faculty as advisors, but those advisors are not allowed to vote and make executive decisions.

The club must also submit an organizational paragraph, which should describe the structure of the organization with its officers and their duties.

Next, organizations must submit a list of future goals and, finally, must submit a constitution.

The constitution forms the frame of the groups: dictates the name of the RSO, the structure and duty of its officers, how to make amendments and other issues which may effect the stability of the organization.

Once the RSO has the approval of both the SGA and Makes, it may petition to receive funding from the money raised from student activity fees. RSOs may also collect membership dues, instead of petitioning for money.

"If they can get the paperwork together, I'm all for it," Makes said of the wrestling club.

According to Makes, wrestling club members originally wanted to have a separate men's and women's club, but she persuaded the two groups to form one RSO.

Cabrera said they have formed a member list of about 40 names, and have to finish application procedures before they can become an official RSO.

"I think it would be one of the more prosperous clubs," Stryker said. "If you like wrestling, it's really pretty."

"We have the people, we have the talent, we're just trying to get the mat time," Cabrera said.

Just a touch of gay

Michael Johnson is naked in my apartment. I brought him there and I'm thinking about porn.

Let me clarify that one. The March issue of Details features a new Nike advertisement of a beloved 200-meter dash world record holder holding his goodies. No swimsuit, no bikini, no one-piece, no thong. All nude. But tastefully done.

Chris Conner

Now I'm a happy heterosexual. I dig women like a shovel. But every now and then, you have to take a step back and say, "Hey, that's a handsome man." While there's no urge to mount these males as I might their female counterparts, the acknowledgement is there nonetheless.

Call it, to paraphrase the Grateful Dead, a "Touch of Gay" (or "T.O.G." for short). To apply this concept, while I don't have the desire to see Michael's Johnson, I can as a considerably more sluggish sprinter appreciate his dieselness.

Catch your breath and call off the outing dogs — there's no story here, folks. This revelation is merely my attempt to explain, or at least explore, why people — mostly guys — encounter false alarms about their sexuality. It's a natural phenomenon we, in many cases, probably take to mean more than it does.

There are guys reading this right now who are discrediting this article as bull–kaka. Well, here's the challenge to you: acknowledge a stud. Immediately. A movie star. A friend. A guy you see with at least two chicks every time you walk past him on campus. There's some fella out there who puts your pudgy, misshapen butt to shame — and you know this, man.

But... you ... just... can't. The ideology has been too far ingrained in your head. Or maybe it'll just take a few minutes (or years) to let go of that mode of thought.

Understand that the ability to size up someone of the same sex doesn't mean you necessarily want to suck face with him. If you're gay, you're gonna be gay — accept what works for you and groove on. Otherwise, It's most likely your T.O.G., and you can live with it in peace.

Enter the "porn" analogy. Let's say you're a big star in the adult film industry. You see it all on a daily basis, and then some. One day, you and your cronies are prepping for a routine 50–person orgy scene when you happen to notice one of your co–stars has the biggest breadstick in the basket. One of three things might happen at this moment of realization.

You can: a) say to yourself (or him if you're extra secure), "Wow, that's some appendage you got!"; b) pretend you never saw it and deny having ever seen the unit; or c) run away in a homophobic stupor, thus leaving the crew to make due with a staff of 49 for a 50–person orgy.

> "The ability to size up someone of the same sex doesn't mean you necessarily want to suck face with him"

Of course this analogy is a tad extreme, but most guys are scared poopless to admit they can appreciate a well–made body (or body part) or visage on another guy. The majority would sooner 'fess up to being a bunny–torturer at a PETA conference. Anything is preferable to a T.O.G.

Except for the weight room. This is the single arena in which a T.O.G. is the norm and not the minority voice. Inside the testosterone–spattered walls of the Meathead Emporium almost anything goes, no matter how homoerotic such activity would seem just outside the doors. A few examples:

"Hey, man, you gotta stick your rear out when you squat!"

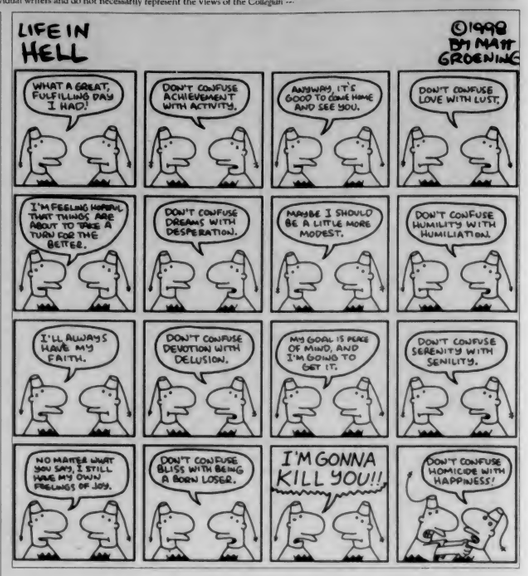
"That dude's pipes are hu–mon–gous!"

"Look up! Teabags!"

On the inside, these comments are all good. Once on the other side, however, you might as well add "because I like guys" on the end of the above sentences, since the average straight guy sensibility has already formulated this conclusion.

Therein lies the problem: T.O.G., by societal restraints, is needlessly limited to one place and time.

Women don't seem to have this dilemma. Ask a femme to evaluate her fellow sister, and she'll give the head–to–toe, up–and–down report with little more than a cock of the head and a blink of the eye. Ask an homme to do the same, and you can usually count on a defense mechanism roughly equivalent to that of Nixon, circa '73.



For those last few stalwarts who still haven't broken down and accepted the truth of T.O.G., allow me to rap this to you — It's not just a straight thing. I'm sure once in a blue moon even Harvey Fierstein takes a longer–than–short peer down the blouse of a female co–star to empirically judge her wares. But at the end of the day, he goes home and sleeps well, still gayer than the 1890s.

So I'm okay with T.O.G. I even try to make an effort to encourage the embrace of these feelings in my chums. One friend in particular needed a hug and a knowing nod, but I hadn't yet formulated T.O.G. to suggest what might be at the core of his anxiety over an obsession with large members.

I do, however, urge proponents of T.O.G. to exercise the utmost care in its usage — remember some of your friends may in fact be homosexual. And if you've ever been involved in something that may force denial, like, say, the cover–up of a South American child–smuggling ring, you know how much it would suck for them. (I mean, uh, I don't know what happened to those brats.)

Anyway, just be considerate of your pals' feelings. And don't trust the Bolivian priest — he's a dirty narc.

A Trekkie at heart

I have to admit it — I'm a "Star Trek" fan. It's taken some time, a few years to come to terms with this personal revelation, but now I'm okay with it.

I don't know when my obsession with all things "Trek" began; it could have begun from the moment I caught sight of Captain Picard's aquiline features or from the first tilt of Data's head (who can resist a man with yellow eyes?). Whatever it was, Paramount's golden goose has me by the throat.

There's no doubt that "Star Trek" has a world–wide appeal. Since the original series, Gene Roddenberry's vision has spawned "The Next Generation," "Deep Space Nine" and "Voyager." But what's the hook here? What makes this series so popular that a ninth "Trek" movie will hit the theaters come November?

Well, it could be that space is truly the final frontier and the possibilities are endless. And in the utopia envisioned by Roddenberry, a lot of our everyday problems (like the common cold) are a thing of the past.

Seema Gangatirker

But there is more to the "Star Trek" franchise than just a group of intrepid explorers heading off into the great unknown.

The great thing about "Star Trek" is that the show is so wonderfully preachy; I love my daily morality lesson neatly bound up in a one hour package. Thanks to "Star Trek," I've learned that yes, it is possible to get along with all sorts of people, even if some aliens would love to eat humans for breakfast. The whole synergy of everyone getting along brings to mind Jack Nicholson's plea in the otherwise– forgettable Mars Attacks, "Why can't we all just get along?"

In "Star Trek," that warm, fuzzy feeling of "gosh darn it, we all like each other" is a universal theme. And if you don't like someone, an airlock is just a few steps away.

"Star Trek" has great gadgets; who needs a television when you can have a holosuite? I try not to think too hard about the holosuite, mostly because it doesn't make that much sense. But that's the great thing about "Trek" — it's 400 years in the future so by then the engineers will have found a way to circumvent the basic theories of science so it will make perfect sense.

Or take the replicator. It must be great to have a machine that will automatically replicate anything you want, from a cup of Earl Grey tea to a new wardrobe. God knows how it works, but 400 years ago, who would have ever predicted space travel?

Technobabble is another hallmark of the "Trek" series. You think you don't know what those computer science majors in Lederle are talking about? Wait till you catch wind of what some of the conversations on "Star Trek" are like. For instance, a typical "Star Trek" conversation could run as follows:

Engineer One: "I must realign the subatomic matrices before the dilithium crystals explode."

Engineer Two: "Hand me the phase inverter so I can shut down the main plasma conduit."

Doctor: "Dammit, I'm a doctor, not an engineer."

But you have to technobabble with big words, mostly because it is 400 years in the future and it's got to appear that we, as a planet, have made progress beyond the cell phone and the Pentium chip.

Take "beaming," for instance. This is a scary mode of transportation, not entirely based on any scientific fact of any kind. It's a little frightening if you stop to think about it for a second.

The basic idea behind the "Beam me up, Scotty" takes you apart at the molecular level and then somehow transports your molecular pattern through space. Theoretically, when put back together, your arm could be coming out of your neck; but most people seem to beam around okay, so it appears that most of the kinks have been ironed out of that system.

The world of "Star Trek" is populated with some very intriguing aliens. Some aliens are friendlier than others, like those who inhabit the planet of Risa. Some are decidedly warlike (Klingons), others are rational (Vulcans) and some are downright mercenary (Ferengi). And some just want to assimilate you, like the Borg.

But "Trek" is more than the run–of–the–mill science fiction adventure; its broad themes investigate some of those issues that aren't dealt with conventionally. A recent episode of "Voyager" examined whether a wounded prisoner should be returned to a group of hunters seeking his death. On "Deep Space Nine," Captain Sisko and his crew are transplanted into the 1950s and directly witness the subtle racism of that era.

There are no answers in "Trek," mostly questions. Very rarely are situations resolved neatly and that's where the main attraction lies.

"Trek" makes it easy to absorb the ideas of extraterrestrials, the possibilities for the future, and how, theoretically, we would deal with the advent of new technologies and space exploration. The future predicted by "Star Trek" is more optimistic than some would think.

While the idealism behind the show may seem far–fetched — no racism, no money, no credit card companies — a vision of what can be is better than none at all.

Let me leave with you with something a famous Vulcan once said: "Live long and prosper."

Ed/Op is looking for new writers!

The Ed/Op desk is currently seeking new columnists. The way to get involved is by submitting pieces for us to consider publishing. They should be 600–800 words long, well–written, and have a point. There are no restrictions on topics, but we are especially interested in pieces on campus politics, satire, and work that takes an unexpected perspective.

Editorials can be submitted by emailing letters@oitvms.oit.umass.edu or in person to the Collegian offices in the Campus Center basement. Call Tamar Carroll or Dan Bodah at 545–1491 for more information.

Letters to the Editor

Selectman's comments offensive to students

To the editor:

The Friday, Feb. 13 issue of the Collegian featured an article concerning Amherst Selectman, Hill Boss. In regards to the low student voter turnout, Boss was quoted as saying "I still feel if you set up a couple of kegs of beer next to the machines, they would have come out like flies."

Selectman Boss seems to be rather cynical and stereotypical towards the students of UMass. As a student, I found Boss's remark a bit comical, yet under–lyingly insulting. As a citizen looking at a government officer, I too can be a cynic.

Perhaps a public apology would come faster from the selectman if we bribed him, or brought in the dancing girls?

I was also a bit surprised Boss wanted to bring kegs on campus. As a member of the alcohol task force, he should know those are illegal here. Perhaps if the selectman brought a couple thirty packs and we brought some dancing chicks, things could work out. Until that day, can't we all just get along?

FOIA revisited

In 1966, Congress passed the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) over the objections of President Lyndon B. Johnson. FOIA was intended to open the records of 55 federal agencies (such as the State, Justice and Defense Departments) to the public. There were nine exceptions, including matters of national security, which were to remain classified.

In 1971, the government got a temporary injunction against The New York Times and other newspapers for publishing stories pertaining to the Pentagon Papers, a 47– volume history of decision–making in Vietnam which was leaked to the press. The injunction was overturned by the Supreme Court on the grounds that government embarrassment did not justify prior restraint. The District Attorney's office actually clipped the newspaper articles and classified them.

Bryan Schwartzman

In 1974 Congress expanded the scope of FOIA and called for more declassification, this time over the objections of President Ford. The Reagan Administration reversed a trend of more openness in the White House, citing the high cost of compliance with information and records requests as a reason. In reality, it costs millions more dollars to maintain the current system and classify tons of documents.

Journalists and historians frequently complain of slow or zero compliance with their FOIA requests. In a democratic society it is vital for the workings of the government to be made public knowledge, and for problems to be dealt with through informed decisionmaking.

FOIA Request

Somewhere lies the secret, behind the stench–filled trumpet notes, appreciated only by subway rats.
Some faded paper knows
why the oil–burned veteran requests food stamps, stumbling to the supermarket for second hand bologna.

Journalist spends several years by her candle light pizza desk, awaiting a response to her inquiry.
Budgets for cow grazing experiments,
and the private thoughts of Nixon, blistering Cambodia.
Journalist, no one will know if she doesn't know.

FOIA, the great sprinter, hurdled over President Johnson and gained speed despite the obstacle of Gerald Ford.
High kicking, you burst open the gates of 55 federal agencies.

FOIA, not a long distance runner.
Your feet grow calloused and cold,
as your race against a historian's unreturned request, and the objections of President Reagan, clutching national security like a shy man in the shower.

Damage control

As we all know, the college admissions game is a brutal one. High school seniors fret over every adverb and conjunction in their essays. Soon–to–be college graduates sweat over GRE scores. Admission committees have their hands full too. Charged with determining their college's student body, they do everything to attract the best and the brightest. And for accomplished students, the game becomes hammering out the best deal for themselves, rather than just getting in wherever they can.

> "Scott's refusal to negotiate fairly has done more to reduce UMass' appeal than a paltry salary has."
> Gerrit DeYoung

Those admitted to the University of Massachusetts' graduate program with promises of employment and tuition waivers are among those in this enviable position. Apparently Chancellor Scott is well aware of this. In an attempt to vie for quality grad students, he ended negotiations with the Graduate Employee Organization in order to enact a stipend increase that should have come two years ago.

It was obviously a shortsighted move, and Scott realized he'd made a mistake. Even though he's agreed to mediation, the damage has already been done. Anyone who's bright enough to become a paid student (even if it is only a pittance) will surely be able to recognize that our administration is one which nobody would want for their boss.

Not only will a 16 percent raise fail to bring UMass' salary level anywhere close to those of comparable universities, it won't be enough to relieve the headaches that being a grad student here will bring. If the past is any indication of the future, the incoming students won't get another contract until their time here is almost up. And it may take a strike, like it did in 1991, to get one at all.

If Chancellor Scott is really interested in competing for motivated students, he'd start negotiating fairly. Allowing the negotiations to drag on for two years is itself an unfair tactic. Many masters programs only require two or three years to complete. The students who started the negotiations may not be able to benefit from them.

This isn't to say Scott should necessarily accede to every GEO demand. Some of them may simply be too expensive or impossible to implement. But if this is the case, the administration should take it upon itself to explain why. GEO's done a tremendous job of publicizing its plight. The administration has done nothing but repeat the warmed–over claim that it's made countless reasonable offers. If this were true, the specifics should be public. In the face of GEO's publicity campaign, and the obvious need for a new contract, the administration's party line is woefully inadequate.

The declaration of an impasse last week may or may not have been illegal, but it was definitely in bad faith. The administration's attempt to strongarm GEO into a contract GEO is not satisfied with makes the administration's position appear to be even less defensible.

Any prospective student who's aware of these developments — and it seems as though It'd be pretty hard not to be — would be thoroughly nonplussed. Scott's refusal to negotiate fairly has done more to reduce UMass' appeal than a paltry salary has. Treating our current grad students unfairly is no way to attract new ones.

Hopefully the issues will come to a close quickly. Scott has recently agreed to mediation, and an agreement may be imminent. But the effects on the morale of the entire UMass community will be apparent for awhile.

The administration's questionable treatment of GEO has outraged and alienated other unions on campus. Professors and undergrads have had to deal with TAs that are underpaid and distracted by the negotiations. Perhaps most harmful is the realization that the administration isn't committed to meeting the demands of its students.

The damage has been done. But if Scott is genuinely interested in attracting and retaining top students, he needs to put a stop to its current "recruitment campaign" and let the University function smoothly again. Only then can he hope to attract top applicants.

Shoddy sources

Imagine that you're watching a football game on the television. In one play, you lose track of the ball, but soon you see a lot of frenzied action on the field. Players are scrambling frantically and piling up on each other. You figure there must have been a fumble.

The referees blow the whistle and begin removing players from the pile, carefully, so as to prevent any more jostling for the ball. Except, in this scenario, when the referees get to the bottom of the pile, there's nothing. No fumble, no ball. There never was.

That's what it's like to watch the current media blitz covering the president's alleged affair with 24–year–old former intern Monica Lewinsky. Every newspaper, every network and every magazine in the country is blindly striving to cover the latest potential presidential fumble and, just like the players in the football scenario, the only reason they are trying so hard is that every one else is.

To do this, the media has resorted to the basest methods of reporting possible.

And we're falling for it. This scandal has everything we've come to love: sex, lies, videotape and even the buzz word impeachment. We haven't had a taste of that rare treat since Nixon.

Before we take things that far, however, let's take a good hard look at this story. We have all been hearing the facts of the allegations, but where are they coming from? Finding out should be a simple matter of picking up a newspaper and reading what the sources are, but it's not.

> "Who was that first player that the others followed on faith, pell-mell, after a loose ball they couldn't see?"
> Eric Peterson

Some publications simply side-step the issue of reliable sourcing with statements like "Individuals said," or "According to accounts," or "those familiar with the document." Other publications resort to citing each other for their information.

For example, one newspaper cited The New York Times, which was citing an internet quotation of an article that appeared in Newsweek. When I traced many other sources, they usually dead–ended with more vague statements about "knowledgeable sources."

Why is that poor journalism? There are a couple of reasons, the first of which should be obvious to anyone who played "telephone" as a child. Every time the facts are passed on, it is inevitable that they are changed to some degree. According to the article mentioned above, we're receiving our facts fourth–hand, that's four opportunities for the facts to be inadvertently skewed further and further from the truth.

Also, isn't it possible that Newsweek's sources were incorrect? If so, that error has now been propagated again and again all over the country. The only reliable method to verify information is through primary sources, like eyewitnesses, and the media should know this. The fact that journalists persist in applying such shoddy methods of reporting should prompt you to ask a few questions. Such as, if the facts being reported fourth–hand through Newsweek are true, why can't these facts be corroborated anywhere else?

Also, why are members of the media willing to report facts they can't possibly be sure of? The answer is that no publication wants to be left out of reporting on the greatest scandal in recent years.

None of the football players in the scenario above saw a loose ball, but they felt convinced it was there because every other player was chasing it. Likewise, the media is falling all over itself chasing a scandal that may actually be the fumble on the one–yard line they need to win the game, or it may be nothing more than flibs.

At this point, you might be curious who started all of this. Who was that first player that the others followed on faith, pell-mell, after a loose ball they couldn't see.

That player is Matt Drudge, who is the author of a web site devoted to political gossip called the Drudge Report. As the author of a gossip site, Drudge is not very interested in the questions of reliable sourcing that journalists must consider. He was even cited last year and forced to apologize for libelous statements made against Sidney Blumenthal, one of Clinton's closest advisors.

Drudge was the first to report on the Lewinsky allegations, and in the beginning it seems the he was the major source of information for many legitimate publications. The Times went so far as to call Drudge "a god–send for frustrated journalists." Even now, he continues to be a source. He also appears to be the origin of rumors that say a dress, given to Lewinsky by the president and containing a stain of his dried semen, has been taken from Lewinsky's apartment by prosecutors.

Where did Drudge get his information from? Only Drudge can say for sure, but the story apparently turned up on the Drudge Report scant hours after Newsweek declined to run a very similar story because it lacked sufficient proof. That hardly evokes much confidence in the story that would go on to become a major source for news agencies all over the country.

Don't misunderstand, however. I'm not saying the allegations of presidential infidelities and cover–ups are necessarily false because their sources are shaky — the story certainly conforms to the pattern of behavior we've come to expect from a president recently referred to as the "Happy–Go–Lucky Philanderer." I am saying you should be very wary of accepting facts as truth just because you saw them in print. I am saying we need to watch the news media a little more closely than we might be used to.

A state of terror

"Old forms of government finally grow so oppressive that they must be thrown off even at the risk of reigns of terror." — Herbert Spencer, Essays on Education (1861)

Decades ago, during the riotous and tumultuous times called the 60s, radicals and revolutionaries decried the "police state," a usage that was more rhetorical than objectively realistic. Rather than reflect reality, the term warned of what was to come.

Mumia Abu Jamal

Time has proven that the usage was not so much wrong as it was early, for as the nation approaches the millennium, we are seeing the gloved hand of the police covering wider and wider areas of social life.

We are also seeing the unprecedented militarization of police, so much so that if one were to wonder at the difference between the police and the army one would be hard-pressed to locate any.

The difference, if any, is minimal — as in uniforms. When one considers weaponry (automatic weapons, helicopters, tanks, etc.), such a difference pales.

In the ancient 60s, black revolutionary and nationalist groups like the Black Panther Party called the cops a foreign, occupying "army whose role was to oppress the black colony" (i.e., ghettoes) in America.

An examination of the function of the cops in the U.S. African–American communities suggests those statements of the 60s have more applicability to the 90s.

In New York alone, the treatment of black and Latino people by cops is, to say the least, outrageous. On Christmas Day, 1997, a young man named William Whitfield was shot and killed by a killer cop who claimed keys on a leather strap looked like a gun. According to Newsday reports, evidence suggests Whitfield didn't have the keys in his hands when he was killed, and that internal police reports on the case were doctored.

On New Year's Day, 1998, 16–year–old Raheem Dawkins saw an off–duty cop in the subway scuffling with some boys. Doing what he thought was right, he rushed to the scene to protect the cop. For his civic duty he was shot by the cop.

While in hospital recovering after a colostomy operation (as the bullet almost destroyed his colon), Dawkins was visited by Her Mayor Rudolph Guiliani and the police commissioner, who presented the boy with a New York Police Department (NYPD) T–shirt.

Gee, thanks.

One doesn't have to be a black teenager to get brutalized by the racist cops (but it helps). Black and Latino cops catch hell in the Big Apple, as reflected by the recent $10 million lawsuit filed against the NYPD, charging a "pattern of attacks on minority officers that reflected a culture of bias in the police department."

SETH TOBOCMAN

The suit came after a black undercover NARC–cop was beaten by his own white partner in the midst of an undercover sting operation. Cop Edward Hughes, instead of grabbing the suspects, grabbed his partner, threw him on the hood of a car, and then bashed his head three times with a radio.

The black cop (whose name wasn't released) needed eight stitches to close the gash, and has suffered blurred vision, neurological problems and related complaints.

His attack was a factor prompting the Guardians (the black cops' group) and the Latino Officers Association to file their suit.

The case begs the question: If black and Latino cops can't protect themselves from their brothers of the badge, how can they begin to protect their families, their communities, their people?

Of course, this isn't a New York issue, but a national one, to which the president and the Congress is silent. If the cops can't protect you from the cops, and the political order won't, what is to be done?

It is the inherent right of the people, of all people, to defend themselves.

Would Whitfield's fate been any worse if he were armed?

Who will pay for his killing?

Mumia Abu–Jamal's columns are nationally distributed.

Sensitivity training — Army style

No doubt many of you worry whether the generals of our U.S. Army are able to take advantage of the many advances being made today by the motivational industry. I'm glad to report that 81 of our newest generals were able to participate in a week–long Brigadier General Training Course, where they were taught how to get in touch with their "inner jerk" by Lt. Col. Howard Olsen.

American Newspeak
Wayne Grytting

The Colonel may have verged on divulging classified information when he told the assembled generals that "Each and every one of you has something that makes you a jerk."

Another unnamed general spoke out about the treaty banning landmines. He warned, "That's the first step on the road to disarmament. The next step is to go after your M–16s."

Glad to see that at least one general was able to get in touch with his "inner jerk." (Wall Street Journal, 1/19)

Support your local spy satellite

Joining Uncle Sam and a proud list of multinational corporations, state governments are now discovering the joy of spy satellites.

States like Georgia are renting time on surveillance satellites built by Lockheed Martin and Raytheon to track down water use, unreported logging and new construction.

Larry Griggers, director of the Georgia Department of Revenue, even admits this snooping from the skies "certainly has a 'Big Brother is watching you' flavor to it."

But Mr. Griggers does not let that thought deter his agency. Why? Because in his words, "It prevents us from having to spend money for other types of enforcement."

Best to have the least expensive version of Big Brother, don't you agree? (Wall Street Journal, 1/27)

The homosexual watch

The Navy employed a piece of detective work worthy of Sherlock Holmes to unmask a homosexual within their midst.

A veteran submarine officer with the unfortunate name of Timothy R. McVeigh was tracked down from information provided on his America Online internet account. Although his dismissal from the Navy was blocked by a Federal judge, the Navy wins plaudits for the impeccable reasoning they employed to determine from his answer of "gay" to a questionnaire that he was a practicing homosexual.

The following are the words of an actual unnamed Navy official: "Under the Department of Defense homosexuality conduct practice, the statement made by a member that he is gay provides the rebuttable presumption that the service member has a propensity to engage in homosexual conduct."

And presumably heterosexuals have a similar "propensity" to engage in heterosexual sex? In which case the entire Roman Catholic priesthood should do what? (Wall Street Journal, 1/14)

Lutefisk deterrents

Norway made its way into the Newspeak big leagues after hosting the recent international conference to outlaw anti-personnel mines. Ian B. Vindheim of the Norwegian Green Party revealed the Norwegian government has been importing and stockpiling mines from countries who had banned them while "presenting itself as a champion of disarmament."

Although Norway does not have an outright ban on the anti-personnel mines, they are clearly persona non grata. This may help explain why, when a shipment of 100 mines arrived from Austria, they were suddenly reclassified from the category "APM-19" (Anti-Personnel Mine) to the category "Directed Fragmentation Charges." A much safer title. (Green International #75)

Society promotes film on campus

By Rob Bennett
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts may not offer a film major, but it certainly has its own brand of high quality cinema education.

The University Student Film Society, after being restarted and reorganized last year, is now an official academic Registered Student Organization affiliated with the Interdepartmental Film Studies Program. The Society's aims have expanded this semester to be more academic and active, while maintaining the goals of facilitating discussion and keeping students informed about film events in the area.

The 50-member RSO is led by president Patrick Daly, vice president Julie Mardo, secretary Alex Harrington and treasurer Heather Nicolaides. Catherine Portuges, director of the Film Studies Program, serves as the Society's advisor. Portuges is currently putting together the Multicultural Film Festival.

The Film Society not only puts up posters advertising local film festivals and screenings, but also publishes a newsletter, "In Focus." The newsletter contains information about local events and internships and scholarships available in the field of film studies. The newsletter is sent by e-mail to Society members and is also posted outside 101 South College.

Much time was spent last semester making the Society an official academic RSO, in order to gain more prestige and better educational opportunities in the UMass and Five College community.

This semester, the Society plans to continue providing students with information and to hold film screenings, hopefully starting in March. Further goals include obtaining camera and editing equipment to be made available to students for their own independent projects. Organization is underway for the Five College Film Festival and Daly hopes to one day host a film festival at UMass as well.

The Society is affiliated directly with the University Certificate Program in Film Studies. The Certificate program is the equivalent of a minor, with a required total of six courses in film and/or video and television from at least three different departments. Working with all departments and all five colleges, the program provides creative, motivated students with an opportunity to study film theory, criticism and production in an interdisciplinary context.

The Society is always recruiting new members. Interested students should contact either Patrick at 549-5950 or Julie at 549-5596, stop by the Film Studies office in 101 South College or call at 545-3659.

Applications for the Film Studies Program can be obtained at 101 South College.

The Society and the Certificate Program in Film Studies also have updated information posted on their website at http://www.umass.edu/film.

Multicultural film festival begins tonight

By Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Interdepartmental Program in Film Studies will be hosting its fifth annual Multicultural Film Festival entitled Moving Pictures/Moving Cultures: Cinemas of Migration beginning tonight and continuing through the middle of May. Coming from all across the world, 14 short and feature length films will be shown both on the UMass campus and at Smith College.

This year's festival explores the ways in which filmmakers document and convey the experiences of exiled and displaced peoples. Often working under dangerous circumstances, the visual artists work as cultural translators of the border-crossing migrations in Bosnia, the Middle East, postcolonial U.K., Asia and the Americas. Many of these directors, as well as Five College faculty, will be on- hand to present the films in hopes of facilitating discussion about their content, meaning and style.

The first film will be screened tonight at 8 p.m. in Herter Auditorium. La Promesse is an award-winning 1997 feature film directed by Luc and Jeanne-Pierre Dardenne. It explores the turbulent relationship between a father and son in the decaying New Europe town of Leiges. The father operates a slave trade smuggling illegal aliens in order to survive the harsh economic warfare, while the man's son is caught between his loyalty and awakening moral conscience. The film was a sensation at the Cannes Film Festival and will be introduced by Hampshire College comparative literature professor Eva Ruesschmann.

Continuing on March 4 at the Tower Theaters in South Hadley, sub-Saharan director Safi Faye's Mossane will be shown. Another Cannes highlight, the film captures the dances, festivals and daily lives of young African women in Senegal. The innovative director will be present for discussion.

Broken English, a multicultural Romeo and Juliet story set in New Zealand, will be shown on March 11 in Herter Auditorium. The 1996 feature focuses on racial and gender differences among the immigrants and natives.

A special presentation will take place on March 25, when Five College Visiting film/video professor C.A. Griffith will present and discuss her films Borderlines... Family Pictures and Del Otro Lado /The Other Side. Borderlines tells the story of a poor black woman who graduates from Stanford University, while Del Otro Lado is a work-in-progress film exploring Mexican-American politics and the AIDS crisis through a tragic gay love story.

UMass French studies professor Robert Shwartzwald will introduce Bye-Bye, a probing look at an immigrant Arab family surviving and finding love in Marseilles, France. The 1995 picture will be screened on March 26, at 4 p.m. in Smith College's Wright Auditorium.

On April 1 in Herter, director Nenad Dizdarevic will be present at the showing of his film Awkward Age, a film set in a boy's school on the eve of WWII. The movie is the first feature film from Bosnia after the breakup of the former Yugoslavia. Meanwhile, tracing the history of Yugoslavia through a magical and comical style, Underground, hailed as a visionary masterpiece, will be presented on April 8 in the Wright Auditorium at Smith College.

The Women Outside. Korean Women and the U.S. Military is a documentary focusing on South Korean women working in brothels and bars surrounding U.S. military bases. Co- sponsored by the Fine Arts Center of Multicultural programs, the film will be screened on April 13 in the Augusta Savage Gallery of the New Africa House.

The Bowker Auditorium will host the great jazz documentary A Great Day in Harlem, followed by an engaging performance by the legendary trumpeter Art Farmer, on April 16. This special event costs $5 for Five College students; tickets are available at the Fine Arts Center Box Office, 413-545-2511.

A winner for best feature film at the Venice Film Festival in 1996, Elia Suleiman's Chronicle of a Disappearance will be shown on April 22 in Herter. The film explores the filmmaker's search for what it means to be Palestinian through returning to his birthplace after a 12-year exile.

Aretha Franklin and Sister Rosetta Thorpe are captured on rare archive footage in the BBC production of The Story of Gospel, presented by UMass music professor Dr. Horace Clarence Boyer. This history of the rich Gospel tradition will be shown on April 29 at Herter Auditorium.

Several films will explore Black Britain on May 6 and May 11. The first, hosted by director Awam Amkpa at Herter, is Winds Against Our Souls, an innovative medley of archive footage and dance move-

I really feel for James Iha and Mark Eitzel. I just don't get all the scathing reviews that both these solo efforts, Let It Come Down and Caught In a Trap... respectively, have received. What did these guys do to deserve nasty notices from, among others, Spin and Rolling Stone? Apparently being an unabashed romantic these days is something to scoff at.

Granted, Let It Come Down isn't exactly imaginative (much less ground-breaking), but it is a strangely effective piece of work. The reason it's such an affecting album lies in Iha's uncanny ability to convince us that he really is a tender and (gulp) unfailingly sincere musician. Is that such a crime?

Forget everything about his full-time occupation playing guitar alongside Billy Corgan with the Smashing Pumpkins, all that is meaningless here. Iha's solo material (including his Pumpkins b-sides) is straightforward, melodic pop underscored with his fragile, delicate voice and lush melodies. Lead single "Be Strong Now" harks back to the Pumpkins' Pisces Iscariot in which Iha contributed the Beatle-esque "Blew Away."

"Winter" is another gem as it breezily shifts moods and textures the way clouds drift across a moonlit sky. Floating on a current of Eric Remschneider's cello, the song conjures up the shimmery intensity of Brian Eno's masterpiece, Another Green World.

The former lead singer for the critically-acclaimed alternative rock group American Music Club, Mark Eitzel effortlessly crafts delicate soundscapes that echo his deeply introspective lyrics grounded in real-life people and places. His first two solo albums, 60 Watt Silver Lining and the stunning West each established him as one of America's premier songwriters.

Caught In a Trap..., compared with those albums, is decidedly less commercial and the songs themselves deal with more abstract sub-

A Healthy Investment in Your Future

Health Care. Those two words have been the source of much discussion recently. Probably because we as a nation know the importance of investing in a healthy future.

So do millions of patients who choose chiropractic as their preferred source of health care. The chiropractic beliefs in fitness, nutrition, prevention, and natural maintenance make good sense.

Wellness, you see, is the normal state of being.

New York State government agrees. They have recently passed the Insurance Equality bill that mandates insurance coverage for chiropractic care.

For over 75 years, New York Chiropractic College has upheld a tradition of excellence in chiropractic higher education. Our combined traditions, old and new, have built the base from which the chiropractic doctors of the future are created.

News from the music world

It's official— Pearl Jam's Yield has gone gold in only two weeks of release. Despite the fact that sales have dropped over 50 percent since its opening week... Also gone gold is The Verve's Urban Hymns after several months of release and the widespread popularity of the single "Bittersweet Symphony."

A Depeche Mode tribute album titled For the Masses is slated to be released in early June, featuring the Smashing Pumpkins covering "Never Let Me Down Again" and The Cure doing a rendition of "World in My Eyes," other contributors include Dishwalla and God Lives Underwater.

U2's Bono registered his latest gripe with the public, blaming the lame reception received by the front rows during a show in Perth, Australia on ticket prices that ranged up to $300, keeping actual fans of the band at bay.

For those waiting for the new Fugazi album, it is titled End Hits and is due in stores April 27.

Also on the bill for Manson's appearance is Ex-Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole. At least the booking people are having fun.

Be on the lookout for a promotional EP from Radiohead being distributed on college campuses, the disc features four tracks previously unreleased in the U.S. and two tracks from their latest album OK Computer.

British filmmaker Nick Broomfield's new film Kurt and Courtney — which was pulled from the Sundance Film Festival due to Courtney Love's lawyers objecting to the film's content — will premier in San Francisco for a three week run beginning Feb. 27. Love's attorneys also objected to unlicensed music from Hole and Nirvana used in the film.

New Music Express reports that British techno-pop pioneers New Order will perform for the first time since 1993 at the Phoenix Festival in England.

ject matter. All of Eitzel's strong qualities are still evident in abundance, especially on the soaring ballad "Queen of No One" which features the considerable drumming talents of Sonic Youth's Steve Shelley.

SO MUCH FOR THE AFTERGLOW
Everclear
Capitol

This album has been out for a while, so everyone has had a chance to hear a few selections on the radio. At least something decent is being played for a change.

Everclear's third album So Much for the Afterglow is a top-notch pick in a genre of music where talent is on the decline. Lead singer/guitarist Art Alexakis lets his contemporary influences show without ripping anyone off. Everclear's pop/grunge/punk rock evoking Nirvana is a welcome change of pace from the factory processed music played on alternative rock radio. At least we know that the garage band sound can still sound good. B+ (Kevin Monahan)

WHEN THE FUNK HITS THE FAN
Sylk 130
Ovum/Ruffhouse/Columbia

The driving creative force behind Sylk 130, King Britt, is best described as a musical nostalgist. When the Funk Hits the Fan is supposed to be the first of a proposed three-part "autobiography" of his favorite sounds.

If the first installment is any indication then, Britt's favorite sounds are a close approximation of what one would have heard on black radio in Philly in the mid-'70s. When the Funk Hits the Fan succeeds because — much Wyclef Jean's solo album Carnival — Britt reaches back to the past for inspiration but manages to bring this timeless soul music into the present by tossing in some smooth raps and '90s production tricks.

The loops and samples Britt pulls out of his crates are from a time and place where white and black pop music nourished each other — the most ingenious sample is from Boz Scaggs' "Lowdown." When listened at any length, the album suggests an entire soul-radio era: "When the Funk Swings" is Parliament via the Sound of Philadelphia with Earth, Wind and Fire's horn section thrown in.

While Britt's idea of nostalgia may glow deceptively idealistic, it still glows with an easy soulfulness and warmth. B+ (Marty Keane)

NEW YORK'S HARDEST 2
Various Artists
Black Pumpkin

Some of you may recall a New York's Hardest album that came out about four years ago on IIT records. The album was designed to re-establish New York's place at the top of the hardcore world. The album featured acts like Vision Of Disorder, Fahrenheit 451, Skarhead, 25 Ta' Life, and defunct bands like UXB and Bulldoze. As we all know by now, those first four acts have gone on to bigger and better things. In other words, the compilation was a good idea.

The scary thing is that the second one is even better. The only two returning bands are 25 Ta' Life and Skarhead, and both offer two of their best tracks. Skarhead's first song "Snikers" is a melodic number, while "Y.A.S" is a fine example of why you don't want to be a certain member of a Cleveland band who pissed them off.

Sons Of Abraham and Indecision flex their metal muscles on four tracks that will have you shouting at the devil. While both bands are in top form, Sons of Abraham sound so evil you can't help but smile.

The rest of the compilation is good, but it just doesn't match the intensity of those four bands. Stealth features Dr. Know of the Bad Brains, Alpha Jerk features Lukie Luke of Gorilla Biscuits fame, and Reach features Richie Cipriano of Sick Of It All. Unfortunately while each of these are decent bands, they fail to match brilliance of their roots.

Candiria, SFA, and Stem round out the compilation, although if they were left off I doubt you would miss them. Overall this is an excellent look into what some of the more underground New York hardcore bands are doing. While the music is better than the first compilation, most of these bands are fairly established and I can't see the others doing much.

Still it's New York Hardcore, bare fisted, angry, and hoods up, so buy it and mosh in your dorm room. B (Adam Dlugacz)

KILLING SOME DEAD TIME
Libido
Fire/Velvet Records

Interesting music has been emerging in the past few years from some unlikely places in Europe. Wales has made its statement with bands such as Gorky's Zygotic Mynci and Super Furry Animals, while the Cardigans of Sweden have been introduced us to a new definition of pop-umlaut. Libido comes to us from Bergen, Norway, and are a three piece band made up of Even Johansen on vocals and guitar, Cato Fideland on Bass, and Jorgen Landhaug on drums.

Unfortunately, Libido cannot be thought of as particularly interesting. Killing Some Dead Time is an album that wishes it can take the basic guitar-bass-drums line up to new areas, but it wears it's influences too much on its sleeve to transcend them. The album kicks off with "Overthrown," a power pop number which could easily be mistaken for the Goo Goo Dolls, and if musical conventionality wasn't enough, how about lyrical conventionality: "Here she comes, she's like a needle in my vein." The album moves on to an imitation of Radiohead moodiness in "Strange News," and an ode to Nirvana with "Blow."

Killing Some Dead Time does hit a stride, however, with "Revolving," an hypnotic song that recalls the hushed grooves of the Stone Roses debut. From there the album takes some more unusual and rewarding turns musically, peaking with the ferocious "God's Guest List." Libido does have a great pop sensibility and willingness to experiment- maybe next time they should be more discreet about their sources. C+ (Michael Telles)

MTV 120 MINUTES LIVE
Various Artists
Atlantic

Every Sunday night for the last dozen years, MTV's "120 Minutes" show has proven largely influential in introducing the world to bands like Morphine, Guided By Voices, Nine Inch Nails and Oasis. One of the few reasons to watch the network now that Beavis & Butthead have passed on to a better place, "120 Minutes" has evolved, even grown-up if you will. Originally a breeding ground for acts that were just a little too extreme for mainstream consumption, to the two hours every week are now the only time where one is guaranteed to see music videos.

While MTV 120 Minutes Live is filled with standout performances (Oasis' "Supersonic" is super), it suffers from the same problem as almost every compilation; too much filler. Weezer ("Undone") was cool for 15 minutes back in '94, not now. Same thing with the Verve Pipe ("Villians") who had their one shining moment with "The Freshman." The producers didn't even get the right song on here for crissakes!

Minor gripes aside, PJ Harvey's "C'Mon Billy" — turned into a bluesy romp here — and Radiohead's "Fake Plastic Trees" each have enough emotion to fill Foxboro Stadium on a fall Sunday afternoon. Throw in the punkish fury of the re-united Sex Pistols' raucous "Pretty Vacant" and Bad Religion's "American Jesus" and you've got yourself a winner. B (M.K.)

WRONGVILLE
Sweet Diesel
Gypsy/Velvet

New York's Sweet Diesel somehow manages to straddle the fine line that separates hardcore and punk. They effortlessly flow between pop punk ballads, ala the Descendants, to the power punk of Garden Variety, to a more traditional hardcore attack. If that sounds like Sweet Diesel are derivative of other bands, I apologize, they're not.

What makes Sweet Diesel so special is that their songs stand out on their own merit. They display muscle and power without resorting to cheap metal rip-offs (no double bass attacks), and are emotional without sounding like the Promise Ring. Sweet Diesel embraces the power and sensibility of early punk bands that made the early days so memorable, and so unrepeatable.

Don't get caught sleeping on this album. B+ (A.D.)

Warren's songs cross barriers

Versatile songwriter up for second Grammy for "How do I live"

By David Bauder
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Neatness never won a Grammy Award, and for that Diane Warren can be grateful.

Tapes are piled haphazardly throughout the tiny room overlooking Sunset Boulevard where the music industry's busiest nonsinging songwriter works. Keys are tossed on the floor. A thick layer of dust covers two of her three keyboards, one stained by a reddish-brown liquid that could be blood but Warren says is only coffee. Wooden shelves and all of their contents lie on the floor where they fell during an earthquake — four years ago. Warren is reluctant to let a visitor step in, more because of superstition than shame about the mess. The room has been very good to her.

Warren is up for a song of the year Grammy Award, for the second straight year, for "How Do I Live," recorded by both LeAnn Rimes and Trisha Yearwood. She was nominated last year for "Because You Loved Me," sung by Celine Dion. The Grammys will be awarded tonight in a live telecast by CBS-TV from New York City's Radio City Music Hall.

More impressive than the nominations is Warren's utter ubiquity in the industry. From Aaliyah to Ziggy Marley, more than 200 artists have recorded her songs. She easily crosses barriers between pop, country, rhythm 'n' blues and rock.

Among her 40 Top 10 songs are Michael Bolton's "How Can We Be Lovers" and "Time, Love and Tenderness," Toni Braxton's "Unbreak My Heart," Taylor Dayne's "Love Will Lead You Back," Chicago's "Look Away," Cher's "If I Could Turn Back Time" and Meat Loaf's "I'd Lie for You (and That's the Truth)."

Gold and Platinum record certifications take almost all the wall space in her office.

The 41-year-old writer with the salt-and-pepper hair would seem more at home in New York's legendary Brill Building, a covey of offices on Broadway where writers churned out pop songs before Bob Dylan and the Beatles convinced most performers that they should write their own.

"I always used to think that I was born too late, that I should have worked in the Brill Building, in that era," Warren said. "But I kind of created my own version of that here."

Growing up in California, Warren didn't play air guitar in the mirror or pretend she was a singer. She had different dreams: Her father bought her a subscription to Billboard when she was 14 and she studied the charts for names like Holland and Dozier, the writers of many Motown hits.

She began writing her own songs and hustled to get them heard. She was fired after two weeks as a driver at a limousine service for people in the music industry because she kept giving clients tapes of her songs.

Her breakthrough came in 1983 when Laura Branigan recorded "Solitaire." Three years later, DeBarge had a hit with Warren's "Rhythm of the Night."

Warren's penchant for emotional, melodic songs that build to memorable choruses makes her a favorite of singers like Bolton and Dion who love to emote.

"I love writing songs for divas," she said. "Send them to me."

It also makes her a target of critics who dismiss many of her songs as overwrought hack work. But crit-

Bob Dylan back & better than ever

By David Bauder
Associated Press

NEW YORK — It was just a moment, one from the road where Bob Dylan frequently finds himself these days.

He was performing on a college campus before an audience that visibly defined the divide in his following. Watching from bleacher seats were the graying children of the 1960s who consider Dylan their poet laureate for his restless, searing songs.

On the dance floor were their children, dressed in tie-dyed shirts, twirling in place and lost in the groove. For them, Dylan and his band were like Phish, the Dave Matthews Band and the late, lamented Grateful Dead — musicians who can be counted on for inventive, ecstatic jams.

Trading his electric guitar for an acoustic, Bob saluted his young fans with a cover of the Dead's "Friend of the Devil." The past year has been eventful for Dylan, who is up for four Grammy Awards tonight. He's played for the pope, put on a tuxedo for a stuffy tribute at the Kennedy Center in Washington, D.C., and suffered through a painful, life-threatening heart infection.

He also released an album, Time Out of Mind, that was a creative triumph, a ghostly collection of songs in which Dylan faced his own mortality and proved he can create compelling music out of it.

For the most part, though, he's at home on the road. He works up to 150 nights a year before an audience, rediscovering and remaking songs from his bottomless catalog.

Many in his musical generation have struggled with the idea of aging in what is perceived as a young person's game. Paul Simon turned to Broadway. Paul McCartney and Billy Joel have dabbled in classical music. Pete Townshend is a book editor.

While the Rolling Stones are among the few to defy gravity and remain popular, the main purpose of their extravagant stage show is nostalgia, and their songs seem to live and breathe in another age. Dylan, instead, has taken a cue from another generation to keep his music alive. Emulating jazz and blues artists who perform and test their boundaries into advanced years, he has stayed on the road throughout the 1990s. His touring is so relentless that one trek was only half-jokingly called "The Never-Ending Tour." He performs at clubs, mid-size concert halls and musty gymnasiums in cities big and small. Even last year, his health problems gave him only a brief break.

Dylan concerts, particularly in the late 1980s, were so legendarily uneven that a popular audience participation sport was trying to guess which song he was singing.

Since hitting his stride around 1994, he has remained fully engaged. His band — Bucky Baxter, Tony Garnier, Dave Kemper and Larry Campbell — is his best since The Band. The sturdy rock outfit, which takes on a country flavor with Baxter's pedal-steel guitar, can stretch and bend and keep up musically with whatever journey its leader takes.

Why he spends so much time on the road is one of the questions Dylan is most frequently asked and, to him, the most peculiar.

"I really don't have anyplace to put my feet up," he once said in an interview with The Associated Press. "Well, we want to play 'cause we want to play. Why tour? It's just that you get accustomed to it over the years. The people themselves will tell you when to stop touring."

A Dylan record is a mere blueprint. His songs take on different shapes and shades on the road, particularly as they age. "Just Like a Woman" and "Don't Think Twice, It's Alright" are now wistful, the 30 years since their writing nearly audible in his voice.

"Tangled Up In Blue" becomes a country stomp and, despite the acoustic instruments, a cue for seated audience members to rise and rush the stage.

"Silvio," generally overlooked when he recorded it with the Grateful Dead in the 1980s, is remade into a roaring rocker. "I've seen better days but who," he sings, pausing for effect, "has not."

Trading fiery guitar licks with Campbell, Dylan nearly duckwalks across the stage. He's content to let these guitar duels spill on and on, and songs sometimes pull up in exhaustion rather than end. Already the songs from Time Out of Mind have taken on a new life, shedding the muted arrangements of the album. "Cold Irons Bound," in particular, reveals itself as a blues rocker with real muscle.

"I think it's the best record he's made," says one fan, singer Elvis Costello. "It sounds like he really meant to do it. For him to make a record that he was really determined to make and to have it come out the way he wanted, makes it his best record — at least until his next best record."

Dylan's brush with mortality at age 56 shocked his admirers from their lethargy, reminding them that this resource won't always be around.

He may make an appearance at the Grammys. If so, one hopes it will be better than the limp Kennedy Center honors, where Dylan sat making uncomfortable faces while listening to a flowery tribute from actor Gregory Peck.

He has better places to be this month, in Cincinnati, Cleveland and Toledo, Ohio, and Bristol, Tenn., all cities where he has scheduled concerts.

Long may he run.

ics, she said, tend to look down their noses at pop songs.

"Pop songs from all time are from a formula," she said. "It's what you do within the formula that makes it great. For something not to have a structure — who wants to listen to that?"

Although she appreciates traditional writing, she said, "I don't write a song like it's on a conveyor belt."

When she retreats to her tiny office, Warren almost always works alone. She writes out her lyrics in longhand, and it usually takes anywhere from a few days to a week to finish a song.

"I'm a song monogamist," she said. "I can't write more than one song at any one time."

She generally doesn't write with a particular artist in mind, but will occasionally fill specific orders. "I'd Lie for You..." was a Meat Loaf song from its inception because the title fit him, she said.

After the writing is complete, Warren records it with herself singing. This is usually a fully arranged production with instrumentation, although these recordings are never heard by the public. It's sometimes the only chance Warren has to hear the song as she envisions it.

"The hardest part of the whole thing is letting it go and letting it become someone else's vision," she said. "It's like your kid and you're just hoping it comes out great."

She tries to write songs that are elastic enough to work in different genres. "Don't Turn Around," for example, was written as a rock ballad but Ace of Base recorded it as a reggae song. When makers of the movie Up Close and Personal asked her to write for the soundtrack, the story of a talented reporter coached by an elder reminded Warren of how her late father had encouraged her. The song "Because You Loved Me" is Warren's tribute to him.

"I don't write about my personal life all the time, because I don't have that exciting a personal life," she said. "But you're writing it, so somehow a part of you is in there. It's like being an actor or actress. I'm inhabiting a character in the song."

Her success has enabled her to reach the songwriter's ideal of being impossible to pigeonhole into a genre. "Unbreak My Heart" put her in demand among rhythm 'n' blues artists, and the experience with Rimes helped her crack a country market suspicious of anyone outside of Nashville.

This month, Johnny Mathis delivered the ultimate valentine — he released an album solely of songs written by Warren.

It would seem, then, that Warren can replace the shredded shades that filter the sun in her Hollywood office. Maybe she'll even get a more luxurious office. Or at least hire a cleaning service. No, thanks. She's quite comfortable where she is.

UNIVERSITY PRODUCTIONS & CONCERTS REGRETFULLY ANNOUNCES THE CANCELLATION OF SPRING CONCERT

Over the course of the past ten years, University Productions and Concerts (UPC) has been on a downslide. Back in the day of concerts such as The Allman Brothers, The Grateful Dead, and the Beastie Boys, UPC not only had a working budget of over $200,000 a year, but also was one of the only organizations bringing music to the Valley. Pearl Street and the Iron Horse did not exist, the Mullins Center had yet to be built, and other colleges were not bringing music to our community. Today, the number of concert production organizations in the Valley has more than doubled and the prices of artists has skyrocketed due to the marketing precedents set by MTV. The UPC budget has since decreased, and the number of its General Committee members has dwindled.

UPC has gone through a number of changes in the recent past. Following the resignation of our Production Manager, we were forced to eliminate pay roll due to lack of funds. This caused the subsequent loss of three more staff members. Those of us still committed to UPC had no other choice but to supplement our loss of income by rescheduling hours to accommodate alternative employment.

Due to all of these factors, we at UPC, along with the support of the Campus Activities Office, have decided to cancel Spring Concert. We do not have the staff, the funds, or the support necessary to put together an adequate Spring Concert. Instead, we are now planning to produce one to two concerts which will be held in either the Fine Arts Center or the Student Union Ballroom. Tickets to these programs will be made available to UMass Students before they are made available to the public, and cost will be minimal.

We will be happy to answer any questions that you may have. Currently we are restructuring the organization and planning the spring shows. The office will be periodically open during normal business hours. You may reach us at 545-2892 or at upc@stuaf.umass.edu

In addition to anchoring the victorious 800 relay team, Brannan also won his two individual events, swimming a 1:40.32 for the 200 free and a 4:32.43 in the 500 free.

Also helping to turn the tide for the Minutemen was sophomore diver Ed Hefferon finishing second in the three- meter diving event with a 506.90 mark that qualified him for the NCAA Zone A Championships.

"Usually we rely on the swimmers a lot," Yarworth said. "Our divers really came through as well. We ended up taking the two spots directly in from of GW divers which ended up being important."

Another pivotal performance was turned in by freshman Matt Andrews. Andrews took the individual 200 fly title in a time of 1:50.60, but his more dramatic race came in the 200 free when he passed several swimmers and stretched for the edge over an opposing competitor from the GW squad. That would provide a three point swing for UMass, just about the difference between the thrill of victory and, well, the agony of runner-up.

This Thursday freshmen Billy Brown and Chris Arsenault will compete in the ECAC Championships as they try to gain experience in one of the larger meets.

Sophomore Andrea Spencer rounded out her spectacular campaign with a second place finish in the 200 individual medley. She was also part of the second place 200 medley relay team which included Shannon Rowell, Sarah Newell and Julie Dragon, combining to swim a 1:49.60.

"Andrea was definitely our swimmer of the meet. She had some outstanding swims and put it all together," Newcomb said. "The 200 medley relay team beat the school record by more than three-quarters of a second. They had a very emotional swim, and all of them put together their best splits of the season."

Newcomb was also quick to point out the contributions of several other swimmers.

"Julie Dragon rose to the occasion. Julie Alexander had a very good meet. Shana Strothers, Sarah Allery, I could just go down the list," Newcomb said. "We had a lot of good swims this weekend. Marci Hupp swam a personal best and Barbara Hickey went out on a good note."

Overall, 1997-98 was a successful year for the Minutewomen, and the future is bright for the program, with only five seniors graduating.

"I was very happy with the season. We were 8-3 overall, and one of the best things was the way that the team came together as a group," Newcomb said. "This is one of the most solid teams that I've had since I've been here. They worked hard together and they didn't complain. They just really wanted to perform well as a group."

There was a lack of motivation this time, but don't expect it next time around. Remember that the next Winter Olympics is in Salt Lake City, and the dream of every Olympic athlete is to win a gold medal in their home country.

I know it's still four years away, but Salt Lake City may be golden for U.S. hockey. Remember the last time the Winter Olympics were held in the U.S.? (1980, Lake Placid, Miracle on Ice — ring a bell?) Sure you do. It might very well happen again in 2002.

Oh, by the way, there's going to be some hockey played today. Anaheim will play at Vancouver — without Paul Kariya. He's still not cleared to play after suffering a concussion, courtesy of a Gary Suter cheap shot, which also forced him to miss the Olympics.

That's about it on the NHL front. There's still another two and a half months to go in the regular season, and it looks like things will go down to the wire.

his coaching debut with a 65-62 win. Last season UMass went to the now famous "three guard offense" for the first time in Olean and beat the Bonnies, 65-59.

This season, all the drama seems to generate from the Minutemen's sparkplug, junior point guard Charlton Clarke. After giving UMass new life with two clutch three-pointers made with under ten seconds left in regulation last week, Clarke is making a late push for A-10 Player of the Year. St. Joe's coach Phil Martelli said Clarke is one of the two or three most valuable players in the A-10, and many coaches around the league think Clarke is the reason for UMass' surprising success in the conference. Over the Minutemen's last seven games, Clarke is averaging 17.4 points and 4.0 assists per game.

Another award that might float UMass' way is A-10 Coach of the Year. Flint has guided the Minutemen to a 12- 2 record in the A-10, including 6-0 on the road. Massachusetts has come up big on the road against Rhode Island and Xavier, and the team that many, including Flint, thought might be a year away from making an impact is atop the league.

St. Bonaventure will have Tim Winn, their talented guard, for tonight's game. Winn missed the team's first meeting with an injury.

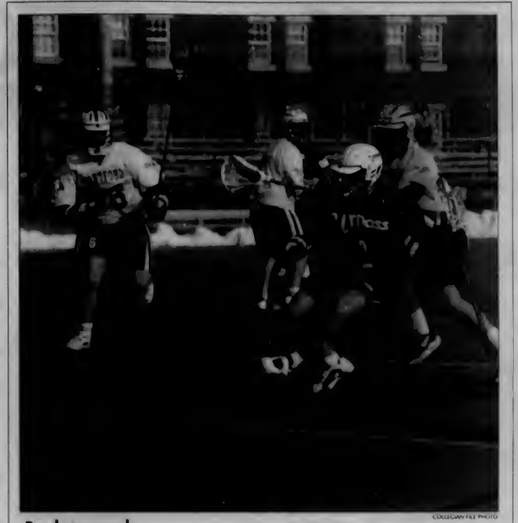
Hull wrongfully accused; wants an apology soon

ST. LOUIS (AP) — Brett Hull wants the U.S. hockey players who trashed rooms at the Olympic village to step forward and apologize so other team members don't have to "suffer."

The St. Louis Blues star was blamed in initial reports, along with Chris Chelios, Gary Suter and Joel Otto. Hull angrily denied it, vouched for his suitemates and threatened to sue those "slandering" him.



Hull said Monday he knows which players caused $3,000 in damage to the rooms and furniture but won't reveal their identities because it's not his place. He said an NHL official gave him the names.

"There comes a point in time where you have to stand up and be a man," Hull told the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. "It's up to the people who did it... to come forward and have respect for the other players and say, 'It was me. I apologize. It was a stupid thing to do.' There's nothing that can be harder, but bigger, to do.

"Hopefully, we'll find out who did what, and we can get some apologies out so the rest of the people who weren't involved don't have to suffer," he said.

He was critical of some media coverage of the team in Nagano, Japan, particularly reports that some players, including Hull, were out late two days before their game against Team Canada. CBS taped Hull and Chelios singing at a karaoke bar.

"We went out and had a few beers. What's the big deal?" Hull said. "It wasn't the night before a game. Why was it blown so out of proportion? Whether we were at a strip club or a bar, whether we were singing or we weren't, it had nothing to do with anything."

Men's tennis falls to Temple

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's tennis team was prepared for their stiffest test thus far, and they came away with their heads held high despite a loss to Temple.

The Minutemen proved they could compete against a ranked competitor such as Temple, but their efforts fell short as they were defeated, 6-1 overall.

"We played a great match against a scholarship level program," coach Judy Dixon said. "We wanted to get a couple of points from them, but I'm pleased to win a singles point at No. 5 and one of the doubles matches as well."

Parsa Samii, at No. 5, was the lone singles victor for UMass, as he edged Alex Carretero 7-5, 6-4.

"Parsa has really come around for us, Dixon said. He held down the No. 6 spot nicely for us in the fall, but now we needed to move him and he has really responded."

The potent Owl lineup was as strong as expected, but for the most part the Minutemen held tough and managed to play well in several matchups.

Todd Cheney ran into a roadblock at No. 1 singles though, as he was matched up with Pero Pveceric. Cheney fell 6-1,6-1 to his toughest opponent of the year.

"Todd was overmatched on Sunday," Dixon said. "It is not that he was outplayed on talent alone, but more so in preparation. As a baseliner, he needs to outfight the type of player he will come across in a team like Temple."

Rob Manshester was a 4-6, 4-6 victim to Lavnish Chatrath, but the match could have gone either way.

"I was right there until the end of that match," Manchester said. "It would have been big for me to pull it out, but Chatrath made the shots that counted toward the end of the match."

Bo Navarro turned in an impressive performance playing No. 4 against Go Sasaki. He dropped the first set 1-6, but came back to take the second 6-1, before tiring and falling 2-6. In the No. 3 slot, however, it was Temple player Krishane Pillay who defeated Alex Aller 6-4, 6-4

Positibly the biggest achievement for UMass was taking the No. 1 doubles match. Cheney and Manchester knocked off Chatrath and Pillay 8-5, in a pivotal match for the Minutemen.

"We needed to get our doubles play on track," Dixon said.

"While we did not take the overall doubles point, I am more than pleased with Todd and Robbie's output for us right now."

Temple is currently the second best team in the Atlantic 10 behind Virginia Tech, while UMass is floating in the middle of the conference right now.

"It is so important for us to play well against conference opponents so we get a good ranking come tournament time

Swoosh sparks ethics debate

NEW YORK (AP) — CBS laid down the law, sort of, after taking criticism this month for outfitting its Winter Olympic reporters in Nike sportswear emblazoned with the familiar "swoosh."

The network stripped the coats off the backs of its news reporters, concluding that a public association with a company criticized for its labor practices creates the appearance of a conflict of interest. Sports reporters, though, didn't have to change wardrobes.

Now let's get this straight: Viewers worried about a network's principles are supposed to consider whether the person standing in a snowbank with a microphone works for CBS news or CBS sports? Television networks need you to believe that premise. Otherwise, it raises plenty of uncomfortable questions about different ethical standards for people who cover news and those who cover sports. News standards tend to be strict. In an effort to avoid conflict, network news divisions don't allow staffers to make commercial endorsements.

"We've got to preserve our integrity. We've got to preserve the appearance of our objectivity," said Jonathan Klein, executive vice president of CBS News. "We cannot allow people to even think that we're in the tank for a person, a product or a corporation." Anyone who scales these inviolable walls is dealt with harshly. When CNN reporter Jonathan Karl appeared in a Visa magazine ad last summer, he received some embarrassing publicity and, at the behest of his bosses, asked Visa to pull the ad.

High standards even extend to retired newsmen: David Brinkley was criticized for becoming a pitchman for Archer Daniels Midland. Stung by the flap, ABC said it would not run the Brinkley ads on the Sunday morning show he pioneered.

Go down the hallway to broadcast sports divisions, and much different standards are in place.

Fox's John Madden, the Ace Hardware man, makes so many endorsements that he has a studio to film them from home. His broadcast partner, Pat Summerall, endorses a competing hardware company.

ESPN's Chris Berman and NBC's Ahmad Rashad are hawking Gatorade. NBC's Bob Costas has done ads for TV Guide and milk — the same distinctive "milk mustache" ads that NBC newswoman Katie Couric wasn't allowed to do, even for charity.

Though Nike took heat during the Olympics, deals to wear corporate logos are nothing new to sports. In recent years, both Fox and NBC announcers on football telecasts have worn clothing provided by Starter and Pro Player.

Fox Sports can veto endorsement deals worked out by its contracted announcers, but generally does so only if the ad would conflict with the network's own sponsors, spokesman Vince Wladika said.

Super win over Temple on Sunday!!!
Emily- Despite a "Pounding Tempie"- you got it done. A great win under enormous pressure- and the team is on to ALL STARS!

Men's swim completes three–peat

By Jamie Jee
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team won its third straight Atlantic 10 Championship this past weekend in poetic style as the Minutemen came from behind to nip runner–up George Washington, 645.5–642.0.

UMass came back after being 30 points down going into the finals, showing resiliency as it outperformed its conference rivals down the stretch.

"After we were down, I told the team that it was time to make the possibility into a probability," coach Russ Yarworth said. "GW gave us a few opportunities and we took advantage of them."

The Minutemen not only took advantage of those opportunities to cap off an undefeated dual meet season with another A–10 title, but also to break through with several personal and team records.

Senior Matt Davey, junior Brian Wisniewski, freshman Chris Arsenault and junior B.J. Brannan combined to lower the school record by five seconds for the 800 free relay with a time of 6:42.31, good for first place.

"Our 800 relay team was one of the highlights of the meet," Yarworth said. "We had been a little shaky going in after some swimmers had just returned [from the flu]. B.J. Brannan ended up being a real team leader, though, which was ever, as they continued their assault on the record books. Also falling were the 200 (1:22.18) and 400 (3:02.38) relay times as well as both medley relays, the 200 in 1:33.40 and the 400 in 3:22.59.

"It was great to see the team finish the way they did," Yarworth said. "We had been a little shaky going in after some swimmers had just returned [from the flu]. B.J. Brannan ended up being a real team leader, though, which was

UMass faces Bonnies 1st round bye at stake

DAVID SOLOMONOFF / COLLEGIAN

In preparation for the conference tournament, Lari Ketner and the Massachusetts men's basketball team face St. Bonaventure tonight.

By Luke Meredith
Collegian Staff

This was the game the No. 20 Massachusetts men's basketball team was afraid of.

St. Bonaventure lies in the sleepy — very sleepy — town of Olean, N.Y., the type of place you pass on your way to somewhere else. To get there, you have to fly to Buffalo, then grab a bus a couple hours south to land in the place UMass coach Bruiser Flint likes to call "Brown Heaven."

But the worst part is how tough of a place the Rielly Center is to play. Flint had nothing but praise for St. Bonaventure (15–12, 5–9 A–10) following the Minutemen's 62–50 win on Jan. 19, insisting to reporters that there was no real secret to why the Bonnies played UMass so tough, that it was just because they were a good team. At one point St. Bonaventure was 9–0 at home, with wins over Xavier and Rhode Island.

Now the Bonnies have lost three straight games at home though, and the Minutemen come into tonight's game (7:30 p.m. WHMP) looking to wrap up a first–round bye for the Atlantic 10 tournament. The big prize, the A–10 regular season title, will be up for grabs on Sunday at Temple.

The scenario plays itself out like this. Temple is 12–3 in the A–10, after beating George Washington on Sunday. UMass is 12–2, and it doesn't matter if they win or lose in Olean tonight as far as the A–10 regular season title is concerned, because a win over the Owls would leave them, at worst, 13–3, enough to take home the regular season title. At 10–4, Rhode Island needs help for a first round bye and is shut out of a title. Dayton and Xavier are 10–4 and tied for first in the A–10 West.

Things seem to be in UMass' favor heading into tonight's game. The Minutemen have beaten the Bonnies 20 straight times, but it hasn't been without a little drama.

In 1996, No. 1 UMass lost eventual national Player of the Year Marcus Camby 15 minutes before tip–off when Camby fainted. Former Massachusetts coach John Calipari accompanied Camby to the hospital, and Flint made

US, Canada out of medal contention

The National Hockey League is ready to get back into the swing of things tonight after the big events that transpired over the past two weeks.

I could start this column talking about the Czech Republic surprising the world and capturing the gold medal in Nagano behind the spectacular play of Dominik Hasek.

But I'm not going to.

I could start this column talking about the outstanding play of Pavel Bure and how he practically led Russia to the gold medal game.

But I'm not going to.

I could start this column talking about the disappointment that most hockey fans in North America are feeling because both Canada and the United States left Nagano without a medal.

But I'm not going to.

Instead, let's talk about Sergei Fedorov and the Carolina Hurricanes.

The NHL rejected Carolina's six–year, $38 million offer sheet which was given to Fedorov on Monday, claiming that the deal was not in compliance with the league's collective bargaining agreement.

What a crock.

As if things couldn't get any worse for the Hurricanes, the league has to pull this trick. Practically all of the American Hockey League teams draw more fans per contest than the Hurricanes, and their best player is Sami Kapanen.

Oh, how the mighty have fallen.

Fedorov would obviously have made an immediate impact in the hockey hotbed of the Carolinas. The Russian is the caliber of player who only brings up the level of play of those around him. In addition, Fedorov obviously will bring more fans to the Greensboro Coliseum.

And who gets the benefit out of all of this? Detroit. The Red Wings now have more time to try to sign Fedorov, while the Hurricanes now have to head back to the drawing board and comprise plan B.

All right, now let's talk about the Olympics.

Hasek is now a folk hero throughout the Czech Republic for stoning the U.S., Canada, and Russia en route to Olympic gold. His save on Eric Lindros in the shootout was one for the ages. He has been on a roll ever since the calendar turned to 1998. Now the Sabres hope that he can propel them into the playoffs.

Moving things over to the United States, Keith Tkachuk couldn't have said it any better when he said that the tournament was a waste of time and that the U.S. played awful while disappointing a nation following Team USA's elimination.

Then, to make matters worse, some players decided to have some fun and destroy the rooms in the Olympic Village.

Real classy move on their part.

The fact is that the Americans were given a reality check in Nagano. This experience can only help future Team USA squads. The destruction is unacceptable, and the punishment should be some type of suspension from international play, as harsh as that may sound.

The middle of the pack.

For those who strive to be the best, it is a place where they don't want to be. For those who are expected to be at the bottom, they welcome it with open arms.

Still others are content with being there. They may not be the best, but they know that they are not the worst.

So is the story of the Massachusetts women's swimming and diving team.

The Minutewomen finished fourth out of a nine team field at the Atlantic 10 Championships in Buffalo last weekend. Now while some teams might be disappointed with that finish, and others excited, UMass was right where it thought it would be.

"We knew that fourth was a spot that we could take. Ideally, it would have been nice to take third, but we were happy with where we finished," Massachusetts women's swimming and diving coach Bob Newcomb said.

UMass finished with 368 points in the three day event,

Castro re–elected to fifth term

MEXICO CITY (AP) — Elected to a fifth term as president, Fidel Castro vowed socialism in Cuba will outlive him and denounced a U.S. aid proposal for the island.

Castro's seven–hour speech to the opening of a new session of parliament ended shortly after midnight yesterday — its marathon length reminiscent of his speeches in the early years after his 1959 revolution.

The 601–member parliament, elected in January, opened its five–year term Tuesday by re–electing Castro and other top members of the Council of State, which works in conjunction with the Cabinet. Castro was the only presidential candidate, and all the deputies were elected unchallenged.

In his wide–ranging speech, Castro, 71, declared Cuba's single–party communist system "untouchable" and said those who predict a "post–Castro transformation" are wrong.

"To suppose that the death of one individual could liquidate the work of a people...is really ridiculous," Castro said. His remarks were relayed by reporters in Havana and by the Cuban government's Prensa Latina news agency, monitored in Mexico City.

Rapist, murderer sentenced to death

TAMPA, Fla. (AP) — A jury recommended yesterday that Lawrence Singleton be executed for stabbing a prostitute to death in his home 20 years after he raped a California girl and chopped off her hands.

Singleton, 70, showed no emotion as the verdict was read after just an hour of deliberations. He was convicted last week of murdering Roxanne Hayes, a 31–year–old prostitute and mother of three.

In closing arguments, Singleton's lawyer, John Skye, called him a "ruined old man" who should die lonely in prison rather than be executed.

But prosecutor Jay Pruner, in asking jurors to recommend the death sentence, said: "He's an old, mean–spirited drunk, who hates women and has pickled his brain through alcoholism."

The sentence recommendation comes a day after Mary Vincent — the woman he raped and mutilated 20 years ago — testified on behalf of prosecutors.

Singleton occasionally wiped his eyes during his lawyer's closing argument.

"Rather than hearing a news story about how the state of Florida fried Lawrence Singleton, we can hear a story like this: 'Lawrence Singleton died in his jail cell today, lonely and alone and despised,'" Skye said.

The jury's only other option was life in prison.

SGA meeting includes apology from Boss

KEN McDONALD / COLLEGIAN

Hill Boss spoke last night at the SGA meeting.

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Amherst Selectman Hill Boss's apology highlighted the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) meeting last night which also produced several motions to help students and more information for the upcoming election.

After a motion was passed at the last SGA meeting requesting a public apology from Boss, the selectman came to last night's senate meeting to appease the request.

Boss apologized saying he regretted the comments he made in an article in the Daily Hampshire Gazette earlier this month. The comments suggested placing kegs of beer by voting machines would increase student voter turnout.

"If you set up a couple of kegs of beer next to the machines they would come out like flies," Boss said.

In his apology, Boss said he regretted it if he embarrassed members of the University.

"I regret if any member of the University was embarrassed or insulted by remarks I made to the press," Boss said. Boss said his comments reflected a perception Amherst residents and University personnel have of students.

"There is a much bigger issue at hand. Whether real or imagined there is a general perception in the town...I'm talking about University personnel that students are more concerned with Hobart Lane–type parties than anything else...A number of administrative staff and professors have said to me that's something that should have been said a long time ago," Boss said.

Senators expressed a concern that these types of comments only furthered this perception and made the gap between students and the town of Amherst wider. Boss, however felt the opposite. He said hoped these "knee–jerk" comments would motivate students to vote.

"I think that if we could...get student participation in government then the whole thing was worth it," Boss said.

In other senate business involving students, a lack of money in an emergency fund account caused some concern. As money was allocated to the Dance Team and Republican Club it was noted if all the motions on the meeting's agenda passed there would be approximately $5,000 left in the Finance Reserve Account, an account

SGA important to all parts of student life on campus

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

There is a group of undergraduate students who control the 1.5 million dollars that fund Registered Student Organizations (RSO) and agencies in addition to making decisions on everything from putting bagel toasters in the Dining Commons to increasing lighting on campus, yet this group is largely unheard of throughout the student body.

The University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) is a group whose function is a mystery to most students.

Speaker of the SGA Peter Kilbourne describes ways the SGA is responsible for the RSOs.

"Except for RSOs own revenue the SGA decides all of RSOs money...We can freeze other people's (RSO) accounts if they are misusing them," Kilbourne said.

The majority of the 1.5 million dollars is used to fund agencies such as the Craft Center, UVC–TV 19 and WMUA.

Kilbourne also mentioned ways the SGA directly affects students lives.

The SGA passed a motion to stop searches of student's dorm rooms during fire drills. "We passed a motion saying this was unconstitutional and they stopped," Kilbourne said.

Revamping the meal plan and adding amenities to the Dining Commons is also within the SGA's power according to Kilbourne.

"We passed motions about the meal plan, making it possible for students on the 10 meal plan to eat on the weekends and making the Dining Commons open from 7 a.m. to 7 p.m....Even little things like adding bagel toasters and waffle irons," Kilbourne said.

Kilbourne pointed out larger issues the SGA has taken on over the years. A few years ago "We tried to make the SAT's optional. Especially with it being biased and other campuses had started to do it. The motion didn't pass by only one or two votes," Kilbourne said.

Kilbourne explains how a motion passed by the SGA comes into effect.

"I have to take any legislation passed and forward it to the administration and advocate on behalf of the senate for the motion," Kilbourne said. Most legislation brought to the administration is passed and if the administration does not respond in 20 days then it is automatically approved.

The main figures in the SGA that turn the motions into actions are the Speaker, Student Trustee and President. The Speaker is elected in May by the Senate, but the President and Trustee are elected by the students. Elections for President and Trustee are on March 9 and 10.

The office of Student Trustee works with the Board of Trustees on important issues such as tuition and acts as a Supreme Court in deciding issues that couldn't be solved through the normal University hierarchy.

Brian Tirrell, the current Student Trustee, described the position and emphasized the importance of students voting in the upcoming elections in order to pick a competent person for the time consuming job.

"The Student Trustee represents students to the Board of Trustees," Tirrell said. "[If] you had elected someone as Trustee who has no experience in University Policy or understands how the SGA or campus governing bodies worked then

Iraqi issues discussed

By Colleen Stone
Collegian Correspondent

Images of starving Iraqi children created a grim setting in the Campus Center Auditorium for a lecture titled "Teach– In: Perspectives on Iraq," Tuesday night. Speakers urged the audience to support lifting U.S. sanctions on Iraq while not supporting the possibility of war.

University of Massachusetts Associate Professor of communication Justin Lewis stressed the role the media plays in misleading the public.

According to Lewis, if the crisis between the U.S. and Iraq was solely a matter of Iraq producing weapons of mass destruction, then the U.S. would be targeting other nations, such as Indonesia, which are producing similar weapons.

In fact, Lewis said the U.S. itself is one of the largest producers of weapons of mass destruction.

Lewis attributed the public's support of war with Iraq to the media presenting it as a moral issue.

"To win public support for a war, it must become a moral war," Lewis said. He also said that the public may be swayed by a biased media. "Two networks are after all owned by defense contractors...not good for objective reporting," Lewis said.

A slide show presented by David Macieski, a volunteer for Voices in the Wilderness illustrated the affects of the U.S. sanctions on Iraq. Children screamed in pain, pharmacy shelves stood nearly empty, and raw sewage flowed through the war–torn streets.

Macieski had no doubts that these conditions of sickness and poverty pictured were a direct cause of the sanctions imposed on Iraq.

"The mortality rate is five times higher than before the sanctions," Macieski said.

In one picture, two ambulances sat idly on cinder blocks. Macieski said

Jewish health and healing experts discuss making final choices

Rabbi Nancy Flam speaks about choices concerning life and death at Hillel House Tuesday night.

By Elana Premack
Collegian Correspondent

In an effort to inform the University of Massachusetts Jewish community about the choices to be made concerning sickness and dying, Jewish health and healing experts Rabbi Nancy Flam and Dr. Henry Simkin led an emotionally– driven discussion at the Hillel House on Tuesday night.

The third program in the series titled "Making Choices on Living, Loving and Dying: Helping Others and Ourselves Deal with Sickness and Dying" was aimed at educating students and community members about Judaism's views on healing as well as controversial subjects such as euthanasia.

Both Flam and Simkin have done extensive work in the areas of healing and medical ethics. Flam has been recognized for her work in the field of Jewish healing, and aside from co–founding the Jewish Healing Center, she has been a consultant for other institutes dealing with spirituality and healing.

Simkin, a Northampton family physician, has presented a forum on living wills and the Massachusetts Health Care Proxy law, which he explained on Tuesday night.

Both panelists presented information to the audience while allowing students and others to make comments, ask questions or share personal stories throughout the discussion.

"The truth about suffering is that each of us has some," Flam said.

Providing texts from the Jewish tradition related to health and healing, Flam presented the Jewish perspective on helping the sick alongside her personal views.

"When I talk about Jewish healing, I'm not talking about what the medical community would call 'cure,'" Flam said. "I'm talking about a sense of wholeness, comfort, perspective, wisdom that can come with looking at reality and taking the resources in the Jewish tradition for strength."

She went on to discuss the meaning of the Mishebeirach, the blessing for one who is ill. She stressed the meaning of the phrase, refu–a sheleima included in the prayer, goes beyond a hope for a superficial healing of the body, deeper to a healing of the spirit.

While there are different responses and resources in Judaism related to illness, Flam believes that the most important is bikkur holim; visiting the sick.

"I like to translate bikkur holim a little bit differently, rather than as visiting with those who are sick, as being present with those who are sick," said Flam. "About 90% is that we show up. But how we show up is of importance too."

Flam explained that to give gentle attention and love to one who is sick is "exquisitely simple yet tremendously profound."

Simkin continued to emphasize leaving personal concerns behind and wholly being present for one who is ill.

"If physicians would look upon their work more as bikkur holim and not with the intention that we can always cure the body. Our ability to be present with those patients of ours would be part of the healing process," said Simkin.

As someone who has dealt personally with terminal illness, sophomore Chanel Dubofsky shared her perspective concerning her mother, who suffered from cancer.

"Eventually it starts to take its toll," said Dubofsky. "It's difficult to go in with gentle love and kindness when you see that everyday it just gets worse."

Dubofsky was faced with signing a "Do Not Resuscitate" order when her mother was hospitalized during the final stages of her disease. She had to interpret her mother's position on prolonging life.

"I expected that signing that [the DNR order] would be something that would haunt me," said Dubofsky. "But it has to be quality, not quantity."

Stressing the importance of communicating our feelings to those we care about, Simkin explained the intent of the Massachusetts Health Care Proxy law.

In order to provide the best and most appropriate care for an ill person, that person chooses someone to to give money to RSOs in emergencies.

Jenn Casasanto, At-Large Senator for Southwest was concerned for future RSO's that will need money from this fund.

"Towards the end of the semester RSOs are going to come for money and there won't be any...we're not even half way through the semester," Casasanto said.

The $2,000 given to the Dance Team will help send them to Nationals. The Republican Club plans to use their $3,000 to bring Star Parker on-campus to speak.

With elections less than two weeks away, debates between candidates were also announced last night.

Chancellor of Elections Carlos Alvarez announced there will be a debate between candidates running for SGA President and Trustee open to the entire University population the afternoon of March 3 in the Student Union. Alvarez also announced another debate the evening of March 3 at Hillel House to discuss issues that concern the Jewish community. This debate is also open to the public.

Alvarez said earlier this week there will be a debate on Saturday, March 7 that will be televised on UVC-TV19 with questioning from a panel with representatives of UVC-TV19, WMUA and the Massachusetts Daily Collegian.

the students are at extreme risk. [the Trustee] could implement ridiculous policies," Tirrell said.

The SGA President is an advocate for the students. The position requires being on many committees, to work on long-term projects and to understand student concerns. The President brings those concerns to the SGA meetings ensuring the student voice is heard. The president also has the power to veto motions.

Current SGA President Lia Wong explains why it is important students choose carefully the SGA president.

"[The president] must represent the needs of the students. They [new president] would be doing a job for the student voice to be heard...SGA is the representative for any policy concerning student life and as a student voice," Wong said.

Being Student President involves much work and commitment to long term goals Wong said.

"Currently I am on about six committees...Most things the Student President does are long-term," Wong said.

Some long-term goals Wong works on are The Course And Teacher Evaluation (CATE) guide, University Center 2000 (UC2000) and the Honors College.

"The President has to work on behalf of the students," Wong said.

be his or her proxy if the ill person is physically or mentally unable to make a decision concerning his or her health.

Similar to what Simkin called "surrogate decision making" lies the topic of euthanasia.

The Jewish tradition's stance is that nothing should be done to hasten a person's death. Despite his commitment to his religion, as a physician Simkin has been presented with the idea of physician-assisted suicide by one of his patients, but is unsure about the role he plays.

"I am somebody who isn't at all sure that I can play that role because maybe I'm not supposed to play that role somehow," said Simkin. "Maybe I don't have the control that I think that I have over this whole process."

Each doctor, friend or family member plays a different role in the life of a sick or dying person. Though helping a person in need is of great importance, individual comfort is necessary for personal survival.

"We have to be very compassionate to ourselves for what we can or cannot do," said Flam.

that while hospitals badly needed new ambulances, Iraq could not acquire them. Current sanctions prohibit the sale of anything to Iraq that is deemed to have military use, including ambulances.

Wrapping up the night was Nick Camerotta, the Area Coordinator for the International Action Center. He issued the audience a call to action, and urged them to "Let these people know that we are sick of blood...being squandered this way."

Camerotta asked the audience to join in marches and rallies to oppose the sanctions and war with Iraq in Springfield today and in New York City this Saturday.

Camerotta concluded the night, leaving the crowd with this: "Do we hate and fear this season's enemy more than we love...the people of the world?"

Palestinians, Israeli military clash

By Samar Assod
Associated Press

KALANDIA REFUGEE CAMP, West Bank — Palestinians battered Israeli military jeeps with stones, and troops trying to rescue an officer trapped in an auto repair shop fired live rounds yesterday in a clash at a refugee camp.

The incident in Kalandia broke out after Israel erected a yard-high wall of cement blocks Tuesday night to seal off the main entrance to the camp north of Jerusalem — prompting memories of the six-year Palestinian uprising against Israeli rule.

"No one can get in or out. It is exactly like the days of the intefadeh," said Hamdi Shaheen, a 19-year-old resident of the camp, which is controlled by Israel. "When they do this to us they are telling us they want the intefadeh back — and we are willing to give it to them."

Meanwhile, Palestinian officials told reporters yesterday they were expecting a new U.S. attempt to revive the stalled peace process. Cabinet minister Nabil Shaath said Secretary of State Madeleine Albright had sent a message to Arafat and the Palestinians hoped it would herald the awaited initiative. "We hope it opens the door to quick movement," Shaath said. "There is a desire to move quickly, and I expect the U.S. administration to move."

Arafat spokesman Nabil Abourdeneh said talks until now had been a "dialogue of the deaf" that didn't even reach the level of negotiation.

Israeli soldiers arrested six Palestinians yesterday in the sweep of Kalandia and two other refugee camps in the West Bank: Jalazoun, north of the autonomous city of Ramallah and El Aroub, north of Hebron. The army said Israel was considering taking additional steps to stop the recent days' stonethrowing.

Young Palestinians hurling stones at Israeli civilian and military vehicles driving through the West Bank was a trademark of the intefadeh against Israeli rule. After the 1993 autonomy accord, stone-throwing incidents decreased.

The Kalandia clash began with Palestinians jumping from roof to roof, pelting passing jeeps with stones. Israel's paramilitary border police responded with tear gas and rubber bullets. Some of the tear gas canisters landed near a girls' school.

When the jeeps departed under a hail of stones, one officer was stranded and took cover in a Palestinian auto repair shop. He fired live bullets at the rock-throwers, the shopkeeper said.

Panel discussion, documentary highlight failure of prison system

By Laura Jakutowicz
Collegian Correspondent

As part of the American Prisons on Trial Conference Week, sponsored by the Friends of the Revolutionary Anti- Imperialist League (FORAIL), a documentary and panel discussion was held in Campus Center Room 101, Tuesday, February 24 at 7:00 p.m.

Though the speakers, former Maine and Massachusetts political prisoner, Richard Picariello and progressive lawyer, Damon Thomas could not be present, the event went on informatively in the spirit of the week with the video-taped presentation of prison documentary "With Intent to Harm" and a verbal introduction by RAIL member Kate Walker.

"With Intent to Harm," a 1972 documentary, outlined the problems prevalent in Massachusetts prisons ranging from blatant inmate oppression to lack of representation for the rights of the imprisoned.

The message of the film illustrated that though prisons are meant to "rehabilitate," they rarely do. Instead prisoners are given little or no rehabilitative assistance and very few human rights. The film ended with the quote, "prisons will fail as long as they're meant to fail," suggesting that the society they exist in perpetuates the crime-state that is the product of a failed system.

Afterwards, a discussion was held. "Targeting individuals instead of targeting the system," argued Walker is yet another continued failure of the criminal justice set up.

Also mentioned in the discussion was former Governor William Weld's shortening of the lengthy Code of Massachusetts Regulations which consequently deregulated many of the Massachusetts state prison laws, allowing abuse of prisoners' rights and mistreatments to go unchecked. According to Walker these regulations continue under the supervision of current Governor Paul Cellucci.

Several FORAIL members, including Walker and Johnson, concluded the presentation by fielding questions from attendees and outlining further details concerning prison problems.

Next on the agenda for the American Prisons on Trial Conference Week is tonight's presentation of "People Us Tribunal on the American Justice System." A mock-trial will be held, with the event goers as jury, to judge the Justice system for the crimes of genocide and national oppression. This event will be held at 7:00 p.m. at the UMass Campus Center 168C. The next major event will be Friday, March 6, at 7:00 p.m. in the Commonwealth Room at UMass. It will be a Benefit Concert to send area activists to Jericho March. Headline act will be Hip Hop band Critical Mass. Contact RAIL to perform or help organize the benefit concert.

Pentagon computers infiltrated

By Susanne M. Schafer
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Over the past two weeks, the Pentagon's unclassified computer networks were hit by the "most organized and systematic" attack yet, apparently by hackers bent on peering into personnel records or payroll matters, the Defense Department said yesterday.

No classified information appears to have been tampered with, but the matter remains "a very serious, long-term problem," said Deputy Defense Secretary John Hamre.

"We have organized ourselves much more aggressively and more closely with the Justice Department to get our hands around this," he added.

Hamre said he was constrained from divulging too many details about the attacks because the military was working with Justice in pursuing potential criminal activity.

Hamre told a group of defense writers the onslaught should serve as a "wake-up call" for the military in particular and society overall, arguing that neither the government nor the private sector has done enough to protect sensitive networks from such attacks. He described the intrusions as "fairly heavy cyber attacks" over the past two weeks. It had "all the appearances of a game" and apparently was perpetrated by "a small number of individuals," he said.

"It was the most organized and systematic attack the Pentagon has seen to date," he said.

Hamre said the attacks appeared to be occurring at a time when a "hacker contest" was going on, but he did not say where the contest originated or offer any further explanation.

He said the attacks did not appear to be connected with the crisis involving Iraq.

The intrusions were directed at such information as personnel records and payroll matters, he said, adding, "Our classified networks were intact and not penetrated."

Hamre described the attacks as "widespread and modestly sophisticated." Attempts were made to enter networks used by all the military service branches, and the strikes occurred at networks located "across the country," he said.

It isn't clear where the attacks originated, or how many individuals were involved, he said.

Hamre said the character of the intrusions had "the quality of voyeurism or vandalism."

"There are hackers that enjoy breaking into peoples' computers, just to see what they can see," he said, adding that the Defense Department appears to hold some "mystique" for hackers.

The individuals appeared to be trying to leave "trap doors" in the systems, Hamre said.

Also called back doors, trap doors refer to mechanisms hackers leave behind after they've broken in. They might break in, look around, cover their tracks, and exit, leaving the digital equivalent of a "key under the welcome mat" to use next time. Hamre said the Pentagon has been attempting in recent years to update its defenses against such attacks, but added, "We have to do a good deal more in this area."

The trade publication Defense Information and Electronics Report on Feb. 13 reported that attacks had been detected during the previous week at 11 military bases — seven Air Force sites and four Navy installations. The report said they were Andrews Air Force Base, Md.; Columbus Air Force Base, Miss.; Lackland and Kelly Air Force Bases in Texas; Gunter Annex, Ala.; Kirtland Air Force Base, N.M.; and an Air National Guard facility in Channel Islands, Calif. The Navy sites were Pearl Harbor, Hawaii; the Naval Academy and two Marine Corps systems in Okinawa, Japan.

Laws banning oral, anal sex must be repealed, say critics

By Paul Tolme
Associated Press

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — Because of Americans' disinterest about supposed sex acts between President Clinton and Monica Lewinsky, some critics of dusty old state bans on oral sex are hoping those laws finally will be repealed.

Fifteen states, including Rhode Island and Massachusetts, have laws banning oral or anal sex outright, while six others have statutes forbidding the sex acts between homosexuals, according to the American Civil Liberties Union. The laws have a variety of names: "Unnatural and Lascivious Acts," "Unnatural and Perverted Sexual Practices," and "Crimes Against Nature."

The statutes rarely are enforced and some are on hold pending court challenges, but critics say leaving them on the books opens people to the possibility of being prosecuted.

Critics hope the fact many Americans are unconcerned with Clinton's sex life will persuade lawmakers to erase the laws. "Surveys show that a vast majority of us don't care what the president does as long as it is consensual," said Sen. John Roney, D-Providence, who has submitted a bill to eliminate Rhode Island's law against "Abominable and Detestable Crimes Against Nature." "If you engage in oral sex in Rhode Island with your wife, you are subject to a felony prosecution and conviction," Roney said. Aside from Rhode Island, states with laws banning certain sex acts between heterosexuals and homosexuals are: Alabama, Arizona, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Louisiana, Michigan, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Utah and Virginia, according to the ACLU.

Louisiana's law has been temporarily blocked pending a trial. Alabama's doesn't apply to married couples, and courts in Michigan and Massachusetts have indicted the laws don't apply to consensual sex.

Same-sex bans are on the books in Arkansas, Kansas, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and Texas, the ACLU says. Court challenges are pending in Arkansas, Kansas and Maryland, while a Texas court has said the law probably would be declared unconstitutional if challenged.

Penalties for violating the statutes range from a $200 fine in Texas to 5 years to life in Idaho. Rhode Island's law carries a prison sentence of up to 20 years.

"These laws are an outdated holdover from a time when people believed it was the role of government to control sex lives," said Michael Adams, legal counsel for the Lesbian and Gay Rights Project of the American Civil Liberties Union. "The attitude of people in the Clinton case is: What consenting adults do in private is of no concern to anyone else."

The group has challenged state laws that single out homosexuals for punishment.

A 1986 U.S. Supreme Court ruling says the Constitution allows states to criminalize sex acts.

"We're confident that the U.S. Supreme Court will reverse that decision," said Adams, who hopes the case in Maryland or Kansas will reach justices in coming years.

The Rhode Island Supreme Court has upheld the law twice in the last 15 years, said Steve Brown, director of the state's American Civil Liberties Union chapter.

"If you have a shaky rape case, you trail it with a sodomy charge," Brown said. "If the defendant gets on the stand and says it was consensual, he's just set himself down for a felony." Rhode Island's law was invoked by North Smithfield police last year against two Massachusetts men accused of consensual sex in the woods near Route 146. The men were arrested, but Attorney General Jeff Pine's office refused to prosecute.

Pine opposes repealing the law outright because he says it could help prosecute a case where rape is difficult to prove but where there clearly is a victim. He says he would support exempting consenting adults from the law.

Iraq conflict expensive

By John Diamond
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The cost to U.S. taxpayers of keeping military pressure on Iraq is more than $600 million and climbing, according to Pentagon and congressional officials.

Money for increased fuel consumption, special deployment pay, shipment of supplies and increased flying time adds up quickly as the U.S. presence around Iraq reaches a post-Gulf War high. Unlike in the 1991 conflict, no large coalition of other countries is ponying up money to support the U.S. deployment.

And with the Clinton administration suspicious of Iraqi intentions, the troops aren't going home any time soon.

Deputy Defense Secretary John Hamre told reporters Wednesday that the cost of managing military operations in the Persian Gulf since the crisis with Iraq erupted last fall has been "well over $600 million."

Hamre, the Pentagon's No. 2 official, said that figure represents spending "above ordinary operating costs." An aircraft carrier, for example, is already fully budgeted for a six-month cruise whether it steams in the Persian Gulf or elsewhere. Sen. John Warner, R-Va., a senior member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said that based on briefings he has received, the total is already closer to $750 million.

The Pentagon says it is still calculating the total, but based on Hamre's and Warner's estimates, the military has equaled or exceeded the entire sum of money it was allotted by Congress for the Persian Gulf region, and that's with more than half the fiscal year still to go.

Congress budgeted $700 million for Gulf operations for the fiscal year that began last Oct. 1. That amount would sustain the basic force of 15,000 to 20,000 troops along with perhaps 120 planes and one aircraft carrier battle group. With the U.S. force in the Gulf nearly doubled and stepped-up operations, Hamre's $600 million estimate brings the new minimum total for the year to $1.3 billion.

Hamre said Saudi Arabia paid the United States about $500 million to support military operations last year. He said he did not know whether the Saudis or Kuwait and Bahrain would contribute to the most recent deployments.

To be sure, the Pentagon, with more than 30,000 troops in the region, is spending nowhere near what it cost to field a force of more than half a million to eject Iraq from Kuwait in 1991. But neither is the international support for today's mission anywhere near what it was seven years ago. The Gulf War cost $61.1 billion, according to a 1992 Pentagon estimate. But international contributions pared the cost to U.S. taxpayers to $7.4 billion. Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) says the cost of the Gulf mission should come out of the Pentagon's hide.

"We have a military on a contingency basis. Whenever they're actually going to do anything, they're going to charge us extra," Frank said. He said it was as if the Department of Housing and Urban Development had its budget and then, "if we put somebody in a house, we have to pay extra."

Tackle the real issues

Julie Fialkow

Wasif models in magazines that resemble Ethiopian children, shaving legs, how Howard Stern talks about women's breasts — as a woman these things annoy me. Their presence is like an itch I can't scratch, but I don't lose a whole lot of sleep over them. The media tends to focus their attention on "women's issues" such as these. Women are often mocked, made to look like crazed zealots, aggressively protesting everything and anything. When will the time come when the media shows what really pisses most women off? What the true source of anger is that makes me want to bang my head against a wall? It's not the spelling of "his"-tory or wo"men," and it's definitely not Barbie. It's the continual violence being perpetrated against women.

While everyone is busy debating about whether or not the Spice Girls have "girl power," a woman is suffering in silence, wondering how long it will be until she gets beaten again.

I fully understand (not approve of) why the media shies away from attention surrounding domestic violence — it is a complex, disturbing issue, with a seemingly hopeless ending. When we talk about cancer we talk about finding a cure, when we talk about HIV/AIDS we stress prevention and safety, but how do we talk about a disease like violence? We can't find a concrete cure or take medicine to make the symptoms go away. So as a result, it is a silent killer, because people are afraid to discuss what they can't control or fix.

However, there is a way to help deter domestic violence. Through talking about it and educating ourselves about it, we can begin to take some proactive steps against it.

However, if the media continues to focus their coverage of women's issues on easy or trendy topics, the tools we need to employ to fight domestic violence are immobilized.

The media undoubtedly has a tremendous role in our society, and I truly believe in the last ten years or so, most outlets are treating that role with more responsibility and value. There are a growing number of journalists who are continually trying to push the envelope to allow coverage on topics that, ten years ago, most media venues wouldn't touch with a twenty foot pole (sexuality, race, drugs). But I'm scared that as a society, our insatiable appetites for trashy scandals will spin the media's wheels backward, instead of forward. Not that I don't love trash talking as much as the next person (OK, probably a lot more), but as consumers, we need a shift in our priorities of what we choose to consume.

Inarguably, then, it's everyone's fault that key issues such as violence against women are being ignored, but I can't help but put the brunt of responsibility on the media. So CNN, I know the domestic abuse thing is so like, 1994/O.J. Simpson, but as far as I know, women are still being brutally assaulted and killed in 1998. Instead of focusing on just the lighter side of the feminist agenda, do women a favor and focus on our concern towards issues like rape, domestic violence and sexual abuse. Tell the world the realities of these issues even if it might make people feel "icky." Most importantly, show hope and portray how many people there are working toward an end of violence against women. Don't portray women that have been the targets of these crimes as weak victims, but as resilient survivors, who no matter how "icky" their lives get continue to thrive successfully.

Finally, my point is this: change can only come about if people know there is something that indeed needs to change. I don't ever want the news I read to be shaped, conformed, or mutated into some lump of non-offensive, sexy, smoothly polished piece of crap. I want the media to tell me about everything they can, and let me, an intelligent human being decide what is important. Entertain me, but disturb me a little too — maybe it'll force me to get off my butt and do something about it. Just please don't forsake an article on violence against women, for one about the new and improved, flat-chested Barbie doll. I really could care less.

Great expectations

During mid-January, while most of us were taking some kind of break from the rigors and frustrations of academia, a proposal was put before the Massachusetts Board of Higher Education calling for student access to faculty evaluations.

The proposal would allow students at all state-funded universities to view what their fellow students have said about professors in course evaluations completed at the end of each semester.

Joe Sullivan

Though this proposal is nothing new — Colorado, Florida, Washington and Wisconsin follow this policy — it's receiving criticism from the Massachusetts Teachers Association, whose interim president, Stephen Gorrie, indicates it could complicate union negotiations, while also giving students the power to make judgements perhaps from out of context information on a proposed web page. Eileen Farley, President of Bristol Community College in New Bedford, also argues that access to the evaluations will cause professors to cater to students in terms of grading.

Eleanor Court, student representative to the Board of Higher Education, defends the proposal, saying students should have the right to know what kind of teaching will be offered and choose which classes they will take with this information made available.

In my opinion, those who have shown opposition to the plan should realize two things. First, the schools involved are public universities and professional information about university employees should not be withheld from those who pay employee salaries through taxes. This insistence of information deprivation is evidence of autocratic thinking or, more simply put, the idea that they think they're better than us.

Secondly, it is not before taking a class that professors are usually judged with contempt by students, only after, when the psychological torture of having dealt with the professor has festered from weeks of face to face confrontation. There are two examples I can cite on this second point.

The first example comes from a professor who, in my opinion, misused very valuable class time in a variety of ways. The class was presented with an enormous amount of reading which we were rarely quizzed on, but were required to be able to discuss. However, when it came time to discuss these readings, the dialogue was rarely in depth, and the issues involved were frequently glazed over. Many times, the discussions would involve the professor going around the room and asking each of us something personal about ourselves or our families, the idea being that it would relate to whatever we were reading. In reality, this professor was taking notes on each of us, attempting to pump us for personal stories she could use in her profession.

At one point in the semester, she actually staged a class for an admissions video. The questions and answers in the discussion were planned in advance to make the class look good, thus making her look like she was doing an outstanding job.

As the semester wore on, I became disgusted with the professor's practices (she couldn't even stick to the syllabus), so I stopped attending regularly. When the semester came to a close, I cited all of the professor's shortcomings in the nastiest course evaluation I'd ever written, and although my grade in that class was decent, I refuse to take another course with her.

The second example is the case of a professor too wrapped up in the course material to care about anything or anyone else, including her students. She loved the subject she was teaching (which is good), but she neglected every other aspect of what students want in a professor. This was a class of about forty, and somehow, involved as she was in the material, she was unable to order enough books for the class. The final assignment was based on readings in a book not available at the store she had ordered from in town, nor any other store in Amherst, nor any store in Northampton, nor in the W.E.B. Dubois library. Fortunately, Smith College had it, but the point is, why should a student be forced to rummage through every bookstore in Amherst and Northampton because of a professor's negligence? I also refuse to spend another semester with this faculty member, and she, too, received a poor evaluation.

Now, let's say I had been able to view the evaluations of these professors from a previous semester. At the very least, there would be some clue to prove these people hapless, preventing myself and others from suffering with them. At the same time, they could have learned from their mistakes, the enmity that has surfaced would never have developed, and they never would have received such harsh evaluations, improving their standing.

The final analysis is that student access to evaluations would be a positive step in avoiding bitterness and resentment towards faculty members who do not live up to expectations. It would allow students to avoid frustration by never having to deal with incompetent faculty in the first place.

Hoop dreams

I once had an intramural basketball team who dreamed of winning it all. Then I realized the real goal was to drink like fish after the game.

Not a good sign.

The Booty Schwag All-Stars will finish out the season without the ring. I've accepted this.

Sorry, guys.

The model of a champion in basketball today is the Chicago Bulls, with five NBA titles in the last seven years. The Booty Schwag All-Stars, though not in the NBA, aspire to such heights.

Luke Meredith

Basically, we're seven white guys trying to play basketball without getting hurt, which we can't even do. (Housemate C, sprained ankle; Garv, bad knees; Housemate A, bad back; and we all know about my Aspetic Necrosis). We thought it would be pretty cool to end our college careers with a team we made shirts for.

But we have to win tonight to make the playoffs, and even then we have to write Boyden a letter saying, "Look, we're sorry. We missed the deadline. Can we play in your playoffs, please?"

Please?

Hey, it's not my fault. I just came up with the name.

Below are the reasons why the Booty Schwag All-Stars are doomed to mediocrity, and why the Bulls aren't. And if you're wondering why I'm comparing us to the Bulls, don't. The column never has meaning.

Where have you been?

P.S. The column this week is dedicated to the PVTA guy who said he was my "groupie," the kid who wrote me the letter about last week's column (I'm not kicking it anytime soon, sweetie) and little Paretti, who thought is was an honor to have me in his home, even though I got wasted and sat on his lamp.

Oh yeah, and the Booty Schwag All-Stars, bestest guys ever.

The Bulls: Coach Phil Jackson runs the team like clockwork, and the players respect and admire him.

The Booty Schwag All-Stars: No coach, no leadership, no direction. I don't start because, and I quote, "Luke sucks." Once went to a zone, and nobody knew why.

The Bulls: Jordan, Kukoc, Harper. Good-looking guys, good-looking team. (Hey, at least I didn't say Pippen).

The Booty Schwag All-Stars: I fully intend to stand on the bench tonight screaming,"Did you see how nice I look in my green Booty Schwag wife-beater," and spend more time on my 1/8 inch hair than my jumpshot.

Hey, if you suck, you might as well look good doing it.

The Bulls: Get chicks because they're so good.

The Booty Schwag All-Stars: Once had 10 girls at a game, before my girlfriend, Big Red (happy 20th, kid) looked at me and said, "I'm not coming any more. You guys suck." She then left, taking three friends with her. (She did, however, tell Garv he was "diligent on defense").

Is that a sign?

If the Bulls played the Booty Schwag All-Stars, they'd win 158-35. Not because they're better, of course, but because Housemate A would be drunk, Housemate C would cry about his ankle, and though Garv's defense would be "diligent," Jordan would expose him for the slow, Irish, shotput-esque jumpshot shooting alcoholic that he is.

And me? I'd be on the bench, because, as they tell me, "I suck."

We ain't the Booty Schwag All-Stars for nothing.

GEO thanks supporters

To the editor:

On behalf of our members, we at the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) want to express our thanks to everyone in the campus community who recognized the danger of the administration's recent bad faith move and joined in our efforts to make them accountable for their actions.

On February 18, the administration agreed to mediation with GEO, thus ending the seven days of our struggle to bring them back to the bargaining table after they illegally declared impasse in our contract negotiations. With the help of workers, undergraduate and graduate students, and faculty on this campus, GEO pressured the administration to come back to the bargaining table. Every act of support was an act of solidarity which led to our victory. Together we have shown that when workers, students, and faculty stand together, we become a powerful force for justice that the administration cannot ignore.

While this is a great victory for GEO and the entire campus community, the battle is not over until we settle a fair contract.

On February 26, GEO will begin mediation with the administration. We need the continued support of everyone on this campus to ensure the administration honors their agreement and bargains in good faith to reach a fair and reasonable contract settlement with GEO.

Comments belittling to all students

To the editor:

I feel it necessary to address a recent letter to the editor by Chris Ryan (Feb. 24). Unfortunately, Ryan appears to have missed the point of why students were upset with the comments of Selectman Hill Boss. Comments about students "swarming like flies to alcohol" belittle students in general. They show disrespect for all students and, most importantly, this type of comment helps fuel the idea that students are second class citizens and substantiates and promotes the feeling among town employees that they can disrespect, harass and even beat students.

Mr. Ryan also questioned my initiative in a campaign for selectman that took place last April 1st. What he and most people do not know is that I ran for Selectboard and Trustee simultaneously. The Trustee election was on March 26 and 27, just a few days before the election for selectman on April 1. I won the election for Trustee. We all make choices in our lives about what is a priority. I made mine and I stand by it.

Finally, consider I was the only person in all of Amherst that would run against Hill Boss.

More students will vote in larger elections

To the editor:

We are writing in response to Chris Ryan's letter to the editor (Feb. 24) condemning students and heralding Selectman Hill Boss' comments. Student voter turn out at the on-campus satellite polling stations was undeniably low. However, Boss and Ryan speak from a foundation of misinformation. Since we were granted on-campus polling stations last year, there have been only two local elections held. These types of elections are clearly not indicative of student voter turn-out. Once a state or national election occurs, all students who are registered to vote will be able to utilize the polling place and then its necessity to the on-campus population will be proven.

FIRST TIME SNOWBOARDER

Bryan Schwartzman

Something about sports like jet skiing, rollerblading and snowboarding has always appealed to me. Maybe I always wanted to imitate "MTV Sports," where athletes risk their lives in non-traditional sports with pounding thuds and screaming guitars edited in the background.

The first time I saw a snowboard was in a New York City sporting store where they were proudly displayed in shining rows like hot rods at a car show. The appearance of defiance and the connection with music snowboarding marketers presented definitely made it seem like a cool thing to do.

I never really had an opportunity to try snowboarding until a few weeks ago. I realized three things, it's really not like skateboarding, it's a lot harder than it looks and it hurts.

My floormates and I made two Friday night outings to Otis Ridge in Otis, Mass. to take advantage of their five dollar lift ticket with a college ID. Since I did not own a snowboard I had to rent one along with boots and bindings. This is how I made my first arbitrary decision as a snowboarder.

"Left foot forward or right foot?" the man asked while he was setting up my bindings.

"Which way is standard?"

"There is no standard!"

Trying to ignore the people waiting behind me and trying to remember what I did the few times I snowboarded I said, "Left foot, I guess."

So I took my board outside into the night sky and the hard snow. Now, I have always had trouble fastening and snapping things so it took me a while to get into my bindings comfortably. One of the things that bugged me most about snowboarding was the amount of time I spent getting back into my bindings after I fell or after I finished a run.

The first challenge was using the rope tow to get up the bunny slope. If I had chosen to ride with my right foot forward, I would have been facing the rope, but with my left foot forward I had my back to it. After a few tugs of the rope, a few falls and a few tastes of the snow I decided the bunny slope wasn't that big and I would walk up.

I would suggest that if at all possible beginning snowboarders should take a lesson and not use my method: trial and error. Turning, stopping and using the edges against the snow did not come easily.

After my first few descents down the bunny slope my friend said to me, "...all I saw of you was whirling snow with feet kicking and heard a sound like you were being impaled!"

Speaking of this friend he had an encounter with the pre- teen skier from hell. Seemingly each time he fell this girl, who couldn't have been older than 12, would stop and say "look who fell again," or "I can do this better than you." After about an hour my friend finally said, "Do you know what it's like to be asphyxiated, keep talking and you're gonna find out."

On my first run down the intermediate slope I also had a run in with a teenage bad ass. I was on the side of the slope trying to get back on my feet after a fall and a kid passes by and yells "dumb snowboarder!"

He did not know who he was messing with. I'm from NYC, the world capital of snaps. I managed to come back with "Shut up, kid!"

On that run down the intermediate slope the winding path combined with lower visibility and my poor turning skills did not lead to great results. I fell, I fell on my knee, I fell on my arm. I twisted my neck. I hit the snow so hard that the support in my glove got twisted, leaving me with one useable glove (that's what you get for paying $3 at K-Mart).

So at this point I decided to swallow my pride, take off my board and walk down the hill. I spent the weekend sore and swearing I would never go back.

Then next week the most wonderful thing happened, I went back. Somehow the things that really bothered me seemed easier the next time. Of course the more I could do the more questions I had like how to turn effectively with my back to the mountain.

I was thrilled to have a new activity to enjoy life with, but remember three things: save your money, if possible take a lesson and wear a helmet.

CONFESSIONS OF A SKI BUM

Chris Stamm

They're sleek, curvaceous and sexy. You've admired them from afar, but wonder what they are really like when their shiny wrapper comes off. Will they respond? Can they keep up with my style? Will they meet my needs?

No, we're not talking about that gaggle of Long Island sorority girls you met uptown last weekend. We're talking about the latest trend in ski design. Call the m shape skis, call them side cuts, call them what you like, but believe the buzz — they live up to the hype.

It all started last year, the first year since I was 6-years-old that skis attached to my feet did not touch the snow. This from a kid who, when his peers were writing how they wanted to be actors, doctors or lawyers in their sixth grade year books, shamelessly wrote that he wanted to be a ski bum (needless to say my parents were very proud).

The college schedule, not to mention the college bank account or lack there of, kept me away from the sport I love the most. As the winter came and went giving way to the dewy rebirth of spring, while the rest of the world was celebrating baseball and green grass, I was in mourning. A year without gazing at snow-capped evergreens, sunlight glistening off frozen boughs and the exhilarating sensation of carving perfect lines through untracked snow was too much to handle.

It was soon May and I was jonesing for a run.

Enter winter 1998 and my New Year's resolution to hit the slopes at least once even if it means entering the poorhouse, defaulting on my student loans and being withdrawn from school. Everything seemed fine until I was informed that, due to my one season hiatus, my old skis had been hand-me-downed to my little brother.

I had to rent, but refused. No, I would not be "that guy" in the lift line with the 1976 Rossignol Stratos made of a state of the art lead-concrete core, rear entry Salomon boots with giant serial numbers magic marakered into the back. Like Michael Jordan's return to the NBA, my homecoming had to be perfect.

I wanted new skis, but didn't have hundreds of dollars to spend.

Fortunately, there are places that rent current-season models of the latest ski designs. Yes, that is right, for a paltry $50 a weekend (less than 10 percent of the actual value) I was the proud owner of a pair of fire engine red Rossignol Mountain Viper side-cut skis.

Admittedly, I was a skeptic.

Each year the major ski manufacturers come up with a new marketing gimmick that is guaranteed to improve the way you ski — for a price, of course. Do you remember begging your parents for those cool gold and white Dynastars with the big red bubble on the tip when you were in junior high? I'm sure you stared pie-eyed in the lift line whenever you saw that guy in front of you side step through the ropes in his trendy Rossignol 4Ss, in all their turquoise shock plated glory.

And the K2s with their fluorescent mogul-bashing glory?

The colors are brighter, the dampening plates are still there, but what is new to the industry's 1998 models are the cuts. Gone are the days of straight skis like those you learned on (until they tell us those are better a few years from now and mark up the price another $100). Today's skis are cut away at the sides in a nearly hourglass figure, more or less depending on the company and style of ski. No longer can you impress your friends with those whopping nine-207 skis, with the shape and sidecut models, you ski smaller sizes.

I've never taken a class in the GRC — Bartlett Hall is more my bag — but the physics behind the design goes something like this: since the skis are wider at the tip, thinner in the middle and then flared to the tail, the skier can get more "edge" out of his ski with less effort. You will find that beginner skis are much fatter in the front with a less drastic cut in the middle allowing for easier arcing turns. For the wide-eyed-bonafide-bump-bashing-glade- trashing expert many skis, like the Rossi's 1 demoed, come with a lift plate which raises the binding about an inch and a half above the ski. With drastic cuts, the added leverage allows the skier to attack the mountain more aggressively.

I talked to the salesmen at my local ski shop and I read all the reviews by the major ski magazines and thought it was another fruitless marketing gimmick. Then boot met binding met ski met slope and there was nothing but a few thousand vertical feet of smiles. After a morning of skiing, there was only one problem, my skis out-performed the rest of my body. A year of sitting behind a computer can do serious damage to a once spry pair of legs.

My only regret was that my quads couldn't hold an edge as well as my side cut skis.

COURTESY PARKER ARTISTS

Saxophonist Gary Louie blows his horn at Bowker Auditorium tonight

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

Gary Louie, said to be America's leading saxophone virtuoso, will perform tonight at 8 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium. The program is presented by the Fine Arts Center at the University of Massachusetts Amherst. Louie will also be in residence at local schools from February 22–27.

Louie has been compared to Richard Stolzman and Heinz Holliger for popularizing the artistic expressiveness of the saxophone as they did the clarinet and the oboe. With amazing versatility, Louie has expanded the repertoire of the saxophone.

Louie recently performed with David Lockington and the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra in performances of DeBussy's Rhapsody for Saxophone and Orchestra, with the Ohio Chamber Orchestra in Cleveland, and with the National Chamber Orchestra in a John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts appearance, playing Ibert's Concertino da Camera.

Louie has also performed at many prestigious institutions throughout the country including Lincoln Center in New York City, Alice Tully Hall, the La Jolla Chamber Music Society, and The Philadelphia Museum of Art amongst several others. Internationally he has performed at L'Opera Comique in Paris, the Villa Medici in Rome, and throughout Spain. He has also been heard on airwaves around the world, including National Public Radio, Public Television, Spanish National Radio, and Radio France.

The New York Times has called Louie "an artist and a phraser, [whose] was with certain passages was memorable, even haunting."

His first solo recording, Pastorale, is a demonstration of this description. Louie's recordings include Alec Wilder's Suite for Tenor Saxophone and Chamber Orchestra and Ibert's Concertino da Camera.

Some of Louie's performance will include the Sonata for Soprano Saxophone (Oboe) by Camille Saint–Saens, San Antonio by John Harbison, Carmen Fantasy after Bizet's opera arranged by Louie, Metamorphoses after Ovid for Soprano Saxophone by Benjamin Britten and Sonata for Alto Saxophone and Piano by William Albright.

Louie will be accompanied by William Bloomquist at the piano. Bloomquist's playing has been described by the Washington Post as "sparkling" and "demonstrating an exquisite sense of vocal phrasing."

Tickets for Gary Louie are $15 and $10, ages 17 and under. Tickets for Five College students are $5. For tickets and more information call (413) 545-2511 or 1-800-999-UMAS. Gary Louie appears as part of the Thomas F. Parker Young Artist Community Residency.

Frank Lowe Quintet starts off Magic Triangle Jazz series

By Joe Sullivan
Collegian Staff

Tonight at 8 p.m., the Frank Lowe Quintet brings their jazz stylings to the Hampden Theater as the first installment of WMUA's Magic Triangle Jazz Concert Series.

Frank Lowe's jazz career began when he first picked up the tenor sax as a 12–year–old in Memphis. After working for Stax Records and studying music at the University of Kansas and also with Donald Garrett in San Francisco, he broke into the big time with a rich and untamed style, playing with Sun Ra in New York during the late '60s, collaborating with John Coltrane, Archie Shepp, Rashied Ali, Milford Graves and Don Cherry during the early '70s, and finally recording his own material in the mid '70s.

Lowe's brand of jazz definitely embraces the avant–garde movement that emerged during the late '50s and early '60s, but of his music, Lowe says, "Some people think we're still living in a period characterized by the kind of improvisational thing Coltrane was experimenting on. But we've come out of that period."

The content of Lowe's music is the notion of a new generation of jazz musicians coming out of the avant–garde movement, but attempting to take it to a new level, expressing themselves in music that pays tribute while also producing a sound unique to them.

Defining this more clearly, Lowe says, "People like Roscoe Mitchell, Joseph Jarman and Donald Garrett have taken the music into another area, where we're still freely improvising. But the improvisation is more disciplined. It's thought–out free energy."

Bodies and Soul (Creative Improvised Music Projects) and Vision Blue (Creative Improvised Music Projects), Lowe's most recent releases from 1995 and 1997, attest to the development of improvisational jazz from the other–worldly stylings of Coltrane or Ornette Coleman to more cerebral free–form playing, but the difference is subtle compared to some of Lowe's '80s material. These latest offerings seem to gracefully but mischievously blur the line between riff–orientation and solos that spit in the face of chord structure (or any other musical confine), allowing the two contradictions to flow together in unlikely union, sounding more like Coltrane and Coleman than as an extension of them.

Lowe's earlier quintet work on CDs like Exotic Heartbreak (Soul Note, 1982) and Decision in Paradise (Soul Note, 1985) relies more upon creating a set boundary between structure and chaos — there are far fewer wild solos and they seem to be strategically placed. From his earlier work to his most recent, Lowe has always used a structured base off of which avant–garde–influenced solos may come, but the latest material makes it harder to distinguish between the two, or at the very least, the transition is a lot smoother.

After recording his last two albums with a trio, tonight's concert features Lowe's return to a five musician format. Trumpet player, Jack Walrath, pianist, Bertha Hope, bass player, Steve Neil, and drummer, Ralph Peterson will comprise the ensemble, with only Neil having played with Lowe on last year's Vision Blue.

Manson's video a little contrived

Marilyn Manson (crouching), joined by bandmates Sara Lee Lucas, Twiggy Ramirez, Madonna Wayne Gacy and Daisy Berkowitz, fail to conjure excitement on new video.

By Kevin Monahan
Collegian Staff

DEAD TO THE WORLD
Marilyn Manson
Nothing/Interscope Home Video

Picture this: thousands of people packed in a concert arena chanting "We hate love! We love hate!" and not a one of them sees the irony.

Yes, in the biggest joke the music industry has played on the American public, Marilyn Manson has released a video documenting their tour to promote the Antichrist Superstar album, proving that the only thing that is truly scary about Marilyn Manson is the hoard of people who take them seriously.

The video opens with shots of the Anti–Manson crowd proffering their propaganda about the hellfire and brimstone oracles they claim we are to suffer eternally with Satan himself if we listen to Mr. Manson and his band of the same name. It is clearly obvious to anyone with half a brain that Manson is loving every minute of the controversy that he is causing. However, the religious–right protesters do not seem to be privy to the fact that they are only feeding his ego.

The video also presents the viewer with the flipside of that coin. Manson's mindless followers. Here's a bit of advice for those who have ever carved, or have ever considered carving a band's name and/or logo into your flesh: seek help!

The sad thing about Marilyn Manson is that their antics more often than not overshadow their music, which is actually very good. Dead to the World is most enjoyable when it shows concert footage, which sadly only makes up half the video. The live version of "Lunchbox" from the Portrait of an American Family album is the highlight of the video. Other songs performed include "Apple of Sodom," featured on the Lost Highway soundtrack, and their cover of the Eurythmics' "Sweet Dreams (Are Made of This)" from the Smells Like Children EP and "The Beautiful People" from Antichrist Superstar.

The live performance of "Irresponsible Hate Anthem" should feel like deja vu for anyone who is familiar with Pink Floyd's The Wall. Manson's use of Nazi imagery in his show seems not only unnecessary, but contrived. What is even more concerning is the number of pre–teens that are actually shouting "Heil Manson," without a clue as to what the display is influenced by. Somehow Roger Waters' lyric "Tell me... is something eluding you, sunshine?" seems all too fitting.

We also get to see Manson cut himself open on stage. It is challenging to find the reason behind his self–mutilation other than for shock value. If there is a deep symbolic message behind it, it is lost on me. Maybe it will be impressive if he amputates some appendages.

Marilyn Manson's schtick is most effective on those who realize that it's all in good fun. So chant "Stop Manson" or "We love hate" but either way, you might as well be chanting "Baa." C+

SNL remembers Chris Farley in a special highlight episode

"Saturday Night Live" said goodbye to a top–notch comedian this past weekend in an extraordinary way. Chris Farley, who passed away late last year, was best known for his five years of hilarious skits on the Saturday night variety show, not to mention his extremely amusing films.

In his introduction to the show, cast member Tim Meadows said that Farley "loved to make people laugh, so sit back and watch what he loved to do."

"SNL" compiled an hour and a half of Farley's best moments, including the popular Matt Foley, motivational speaker, skits.

Farley really shined in the Matt Foley skits, showing off his comedic talent time and time again with outrageous outbursts of screaming and twitching, not to mention the oft–used phrase, claiming that Foley "lives in a van down by the river!"

Other famous skits revisited including the ones where Farley portrayed a heart–attack prone Chicago superfan, as well as various episodes of "The Chris Farley Show" in which he interviewed celebrities such as Paul McCartney and Jeff Daniels — but always seemed at a lost for words.

Farley appeared to be an inspirational actor and a nice person. He often participated in fundraisers and was a strong supporter of anti–drug campaigns. This is ironic in that Farley's death was drug related.

Keeping on the topic of drugs in television, this past Tuesday ABC provided an episode of "Home Improvement" that involved the Taylors discovering drugs in their own backyard. The first half of the episode was written as a "who done it" type of plot. Even to the point when the parents know who it was, all you could see was the feet of the culprit. The camera later panned slowly up to reveal that the user was Brad, the oldest Taylor boy.

Just when I thought it was time to say good–bye to the long running show that seemed to be dying fast and losing viewers as it tumbled down the ratings, "Home Improvement" came out with one of the best episodes in years. My biggest problem with "Home Improvement" is that it has become too much a show about "dealing with the issues" and forgotten about where its grass roots are. Does anyone remember how funny the show used to be? Even though the writers did a great job with this week's episode, if lack of viewers and drops in the Nielsons continue, it seems that we will be seeing the end of the Taylor family in the very near future.

Did anyone catch last Thursday's episode of "The Late Show with David Letterman?" I'm not a big fan of the show, but what did catch my eye were the guests invited for the night. Letterman thought it might be interesting, to say the least, to mix former Senator Bob Dole and psychopath musician, Marilyn Manson.

Dole, who displayed his extreme dislike of Manson during his presidential campaign in 1996, found it humorous that he was booked the same night as Manson, a person for whom he has very little respect for. However, no fireworks really, since the two never appeared side–by–side on the show. Though, when Letterman queried whether Dole would like to stick around to meet Manson, Dole replied "I'd love to but I have a plane to catch."

When it was Manson's turn to comment on Bob Dole, he pointed to his purple scarf and said, "He gave me this." Manson tried as hard as he could to shock the audience who was watching him by saying provocative things like, "I set fires," "I break stuff" and "I've been arrested for being naked on stage."

Manson told the audience that "I like to provoke people so they think. That's a healthy part of entertainment you don't get from the Spice Girls."

Perhaps the most revolting part of the interview came when Letterman asked Manson about his childhood. Manson said, "My father sprayed Agent Orange in Vietnam. My grandfather was a cross–dressing truck driver who collected bestiality pornography. My mother started keeping rats for pets and she called one Marilyn."

"So what you're saying is that it was pretty much 'Leave It To Beaver' at your house," Letterman answered.

I think this past week we all learned a valuable lesson from Professor Eric Cartman on "South Park." If someone asks you to "roeshambo," don't do it! Guys, if you do not know what I mean by this, just trust me; roeshambo is not the latest dance craze!

Television fans can look forward to a barrage of new episodes of all of their favorites this week. For the past weeks, shows such as "Friends," "Seinfeld," "Frasier" and "ER" have been running repeats against the Winter Olympics. Tonight's "must–see TV" line–up is all news.

In other news, there are rumors circling about what Jerry Seinfeld will do after he leaves his top–rated show. It seems that Seinfeld will head to Broadway to attempt a two week career on the stage. There was no word about what Jerry will perform in, just that HBO will be behind whatever he does. It is also rumored that one of NBC's top Emmy award winning show for the '90s, "Frasier," is the top contender for the Thursday 9:30 p.m. slot.

Who is the fool in Kissing A Fool?

By Carol Deegan
Associated Press

In "Kissing A Fool," the new film directed by Doug Ellin, Jason Lee portrays an aspiring writer who's trying to get over a failed relationship.

Lee, who appeared in the highly acclaimed Kevin Scott film, "Chasing Amy," sees his "Fool"-ish character as a guy who spends too much time missing his ex girlfriend. Way too much time. "I've had a heartbreak like that before, sure," said Lee, 27, in a telephone interview from his home in Los Angeles. "But I didn't dwell on it for as long as he does and eventually make it into a book. But there's similarities there, for sure."

Filmed in Chicago, "Kissing A Fool" begins and ends with a wedding scene. But who's getting married? Jay, played by Lee, or his best friend, Max? Both find themselves attracted to Jay's book editor, Sam, played by Mili Avital.

The film is a light romantic comedy.

"There's a lot of very interesting circumstances in the movie and there's believable circumstances, and the characters are identifiable and relatable to what people go through, so there's humor along the way," Lee said. "But at the end, things sort of resolve themselves just like they do in life, I guess. So there's some good stuff for everyone."

Max is portrayed by David Schwimmer, one of NBC's "Friends." Although Max is engaged to Sam, he finds himself wondering if she is really "the one." So he asks Jay to put Sam's faithfulness to the test. (Talk about romantic entanglements!)

So, who's the fool in "Kissing A Fool"?

"At some point, I guess, all three of them," Lee said. "And they sort of have to go through their own things to get to a good place, which is really what happens in life anyway."

What drew Lee to the film?

"The script, first of all, and then also the experience of working with an entirely new group of people, which was to me a challenge because I had done two feature films with Kevin Smith. And this was to be my first feature film outside of working with Kevin, and I sort of had to take everything I had learned working with him and apply it to a whole new situation," he said. "Everybody kept it light, it wasn't a very heavy, heavy thing, there was a lot of goofing off, and everyone pretty much shared the same sense of humor, which is good, so we all got along well," Lee said.

The cast also includes "Jerry Maguire's" Bonnie Hunt and Vanessa Angel as Natasha, the woman Jay can't seem to forget. Lee said he enjoyed working with Schwimmer. "It was definitely easy because he's a good actor and takes it very seriously, and he played this character very well. But he definitely got mobbed everywhere we went."

Would Lee like to be someone who gets mobbed everywhere he goes? "Fortunately, the recognition I've gotten has been for the work I did in 'Chasing Amy,' and people always compliment the movie and how much they liked it, and it's a very kind of sincere recognition, which is the best kind of recognition, I think." His upcoming projects include a new Kevin Scott film, "Dogma," set to start filming in April, which will also star Linda Fiorentino, Chris Rock, Selma Hayek, Matt Damon and Ben Affleck. "Can't make a Kevin Smith film without me. I'd like to hope," said Lee with a laugh.

Eclectic debut album for Coppola

By Nekesa Mumbi Moody
Associated Press

If Imani Coppola's debut album sounds like it's all over the place, it's because...well, it is.

But Chupacabra, an eclectic mix of rap, alternative rock and urban music, is an accurate reflection of the diverse talents of this 19-year-old singer. (While some may stumble at first over the album's title, Imani says "chupacabra" means "goat sucker" in Spanish).

Her background is jazz and classical music. She planned to major in orchestra at the State University of New York but switched to studio composition. She writes poetry and children's plays. And she wants to be an actress.

She said the album is "a good way to start off my future career — whatever that may be."

When it was released by Columbia Records last fall, Chupacabra won raves from music critics. Its campy video, "Legend of a Cowgirl," which depicts Coppola as a waitress, a '60s singer and a biker chick, quickly became a staple on MTV. "I have a lot of different talents and I can do them all well. And it's just a matter of zoning in on one talent," Coppola said. "I mean, I don't see this as what I'm going do for the rest of my life. Write songs and do videos? I hope not!"

Described as "a modern-day flower child with common sense," she's been praised for her supple vocals and fanciful raps. "No goat-blood sucking beasts here," wrote one reviewer, "just an energetic debut from this young New Yorker, whose kitchen-sink blend of beats, guitars, violin, rapping and singing recalls Beck, Luscious Jackson and Garbage. With co-producer Mike Mangini (Digable Planets), multi-instrumentalist Coppola crafts appealingly sugar, slick textures."

Despite her initial success, Coppola is hardly enamored with the music industry.

"They just want you to be one...thing, one category, because they love to categorize people," she complained. "There were a lot of times where I just wanted to go completely crazy in the studio, and I didn't get to do that because of marketability and what not and pleasing the A&R person in the record company." She did, however, get a chance to showcase her many talents. She sings and raps, and she plays the violin on nearly every track, while also handling some of the album's keyboard-playing.

Music has always been an important part of her life.

When she was 6 years-old, she played the violin with her father and his friends during impromptu jazz sessions at their family home.

The Coppolas lived in the center of suburbia on New York's Long Island. But they were not a typical suburban family. "We were very, very different from everybody else and they didn't understand, so their way of dealing with that was just calling us names," she said.

"I grew up in a...white trash neighborhood surrounded by a bunch of uncultured, untalented, middle-class people. My mom, black, my dad, Italian, and five multiracial kids running around, and it was sort of hard growing up there."

College life wasn't easy, either.

"I hated it. I hated living there," said Coppola, referring to the State University of New York at Purchase, where she has taken a leave of absence. "There was nothing to do, it was...cold all the time. There was a bunch of weird artists, weirdos...it's very artsy."

However, Coppola admits to feeling a bit homesick for her college days. Life in the spotlight hasn't been easy. "I'm sort of a moody person and it does not help in this field. You've just got to be clearheaded, focused and happy."

But she's adjusting. Her spring touring schedule includes appearances in Seattle; Portland, Ore.; Austin, Texas; and Atlanta. "It's just starting to go well right now, I think. It was totally overwhelming and at times now it's overwhelming, but it's all good."

"Women of the Village" perform at next Something Every Friday

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

Something Every Friday, a special series of free events on the University of Massachusetts campus, will present a musical event entitled, "Women of the Village."

This event, which is special for Black History Month, includes a 14-member ensemble of musicians and singers. The ensemble features vocalists Valerie Stephens, Merida Castillo, and Bongi Goba. The performance starts tomorrow night at 8 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom.

Everything from international jazz and blues will be featured in this musical celebration. These musical selections will be presented in various forms, including song, poetry and dance.

Developed by the producer Valerie Stephens, who is also one of the performers, this creative concept exposes the audience to various genres of international music. Ranging from rich American jazz and blues, traditional South African melodies and energetic rhythms from Cuba, "Women of the Village" attempts to use this wide array of sounds to convey the idea that music, regardless of language, transcends all boundaries.

The music director for "Women of the Village," Frank Wilkins, brings over 20 years of experience as a professional musician. Wilkins is much sought after jazz pianist, performed with Al Jarreau, Lenny Baker, Kevin Eubanks, Nnenna McCurdy and Sayee.

Something Every Friday (SEF) is a series of free and open programs on the UMASS Campus. Each week during the school year SEF presents comedy, music, poetry, movies, very occasional ethnic special events. Now in its third year SEF continues to offer the campus and community alternative program options. This event is made possible by a grant from the UMASS Auxiliary Services Office. Mad about As Good As It Gets

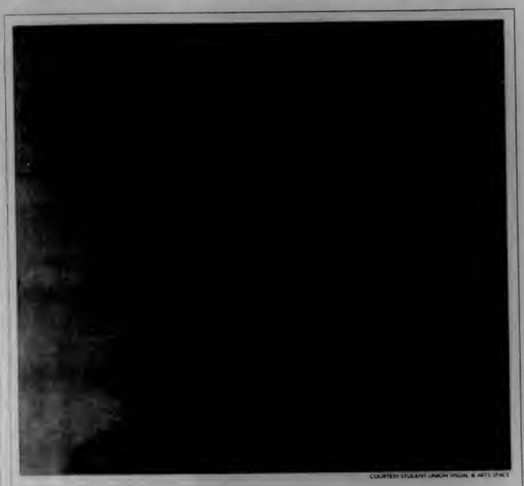
By Lynn Elber
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — If this is as good as it gets, Helen Hunt won't complain.

A Golden Globe for her role in writer-director James Brooks' romantic comedy As Good As It Gets. A best-actress Oscar nomination as well. And a satisfying six-year run in a successful TV series, "Mad About You."

Not to mention — and she'd prefer you didn't, actually — her longtime relationship with Hank Azaria, who gained accolades for his flamboyant houseboy role in The Birdcage.

"The chance to get to work on a show (Mad About You) with people I care about as much as this and that's as collaborative as this and the chance to work for and with somebody like Jim Brooks — who could hope for those things in a career, much less in a year," said Hunt.



Not everything's perfect. Hunt and Paul Reiser were debating whether to return for a seventh season as young marrieds Paul and Jamie Buchman. Speculation had it that her Oscar nod ensured Hunt would leave television for movies.

"I've read things that say that's going to decide it, my movie career. But the truth is, I've been able to have a pretty full movie career while doing this show," said Hunt, whose credits include the blockbuster Twister.

Of course, there's a child to consider now: The Buchman family grew to include infant daughter Mabel last year. Hunt said she thinks the show's focus is unchanged, even with baby on board.

"I think the goal has remained the same — to make a show about two people trying to love each other while their world changes. So this baby has been that, giving them jumping-off points" — for stories about breast-feeding and other new-parent challenges. Hunt's openness about her career is matched by her well-known reticence about her personal life. Although she resists talking about her beau, she's clearly pleased by a compliment for Azaria's work in the new film Great Expectations.

"I thought his was the best performance," she offers. Clearly, she's mad about someone.

Watching the Oscars

By Bob Thomas
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — As Titanic hurtles toward box-office records, its chances of winning the Academy Award for best picture of 1997 also appear to be growing.

Not that money is a major factor in how Academy members vote. Nor was Titanic the best-crafted movie of the year. James Cameron's screenplay, lampooned by many critics for its inane dialogue, was not among the film's 14 nominations.

But Titanic has proved to be an "event" movie unlike any since the 1939 epic Gone With the Wind.

Few films have survived such negative publicity as that surrounding Titanic. For almost a year, Cameron was pilloried as an obsessed, slave-driving profligate destined to impoverish his backers — Twentieth Century Fox and Paramount.

Now Cameron is proclaimed a genius. Forget the $200 million price tag; Titanic is expected to turn a $100 million profit for each studio.

However, the film is not necessarily enriching Cameron. During the financial crisis when the movie was being made, he agreed to give up his profit participation in order to keep shooting. Not to worry. Fox and Paramount are reportedly considering bonuses for their fair-haired boy.

Cameron, 43, a native of Kapuskasing, Ontario, insists he wasn't thinking Oscars while making Titanic.

"Because then you start to referee the creative process with, 'Well, what will the critics think?' Or, 'What will the Academy think?' And that's a sure way to make a pompous film," he says.

In any other year, Curtis Hanson's L.A. Confidential might well be the front-runner in the Academy race for best picture. It was embraced by the film community as a wholly original and inventive revival of the film noir of the 1940s and '50s.

A native of Los Angeles, Hanson adapted James Ellroy's novel of cop corruption in postwar L.A. and filmed it with a truly ensemble cast.

"It's my most personal movie," Hanson, 52, whose previous films include The River Wild and The Hand That Rocks the Cradle, says. "Whether it achieves any popular acceptance or not is less important to me. That's not why I made it."

In fact, L.A. Confidential turned out to be an underachiever at the box office; it is likely to collect about $50 million in domestic gross. But it's been widely acclaimed, scoring best-picture with most critics' organizations and appearing on most reviewers' year-end Top 10 lists.

James L. Brooks' As Good as It Gets has won wide acceptance, both in Hollywood and across the country (it has reached the magical territory, surpassing $100 million domestic gross). Brooks, 57, born in North Bergen, N.J., already has three Oscars for writing, co-producing and directing his first film, Terms of Endearment (1983).

With As Good As It Gets, he brought comedy to the situation of a man with an obsessive-compulsive disorder.

"It's an illness that most of us can relate to," Brooks has said. "We all get obsessed, and we are all compulsive about certain things — just not clinically so."

The film drew seven nominations, including those for the actors, Jack Nicholson, Helen Hunt and Greg Kinnear. But not, strangely enough, for Brooks' direction. That's one of the things that puzzle Oscar watchers: How can a movie be nominated for best picture, screenplay and three actors and not for the man who put it all together?

Good Will Hunting is another film that has won the hearts and minds of audiences everywhere. Following the pattern of Sylvester Stallone in Rocky, little-known actors Matt Damon and Ben Affleck wrote a script with fat parts for themselves.

Damon cast himself as a trouble-making Bostonian who works as a janitor at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, where he astounds the faculty by solving obscure formulas left on the blackboard. Affleck took the role as best friend.

Gus Van Sant, 45, seemed an unlikely choice to direct such a feel-good movie. He had built a reputation for directing hard-edged, low-budget films such as Drugstore Cowboy and My Own Private Idaho.

Tough field awaits softball in Georgia

By Jackie Leroux
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's softball team will be looking to get itself back into the national rankings this weekend when it takes part in the National Fast-Pitch Coaches Association (NFCA) Leadoff Classic.

The tournament will take place at the South Commons Complex in Columbus, Ga. The Classic starts on Friday and runs through Wednesday, March 4.

After going 1-3 in the Coca-Cola Classic tournament in Arizona two weeks ago, the Minutewomen found themselves knocked out of the national rankings. They are currently first in the also-receiving votes category. UMass started off the season ranked No. 12 in the pre-season USA Today/NFCA coaches poll.

"The way to get back in the top 25 is do well in this tournament," coach Elaine Sortino said. "This is our opportunity to gain national recognition again, and I think we have to seize the moment. We have to go there and play really well and make a good showing."

The NFCA Leadoff boasts the toughest competition of any softball tournament. The Classic will feature 20 of the nation's top teams, including four participants from the 1997 Women's College World Series: South Carolina, Washington, Michigan and Massachusetts. Six teams which participated in the NCAA Regionals will also be featured, including Arizona State, California, Nebraska, Nicholls State, Oklahoma and Oklahoma State. Eleven of this year's teams are ranked in the current USA Today/NFCA coaches poll, including eight of the top eleven. Four other teams received votes in the poll, including UMass.

To be invited to the tournament a team must have participated in the NCAA tournament, or a Play-In, within the past two seasons.

"The first two trips we take are the toughest two schedules that we will play back-to-back," Sortino said. "There is no mercy, there is no room for error."

The tournament will consist of pool play, followed by five different brackets. There will be five pools, each consisting of four teams. The top teams from the top four pools will play in the gold tournament. The remaining pool winner and the top three pools' second-place winners will comprise the silver tournament.

UMass is slated to take on No. 24 Cal-State Northridge at 2 p.m. tomorrow, followed by a 4 p.m. rematch with No. 2 Washington. UMass lost, 1-2, against Washington in the Coca-Cola Classic.

On Saturday, the Minutewomen will contest No. 9 Florida State at 12 p.m., followed by a match with Indiana at 4 p.m. The tournament playoffs will begin on Sunday.

Despite the losing record in Arizona, Sortino feels the Minutewomen gave a very strong showing.

"We didn't win games [in Arizona], but we played well within parts of games, and that leads me to believe that there are a lot of good things to follow for this team," she said. "We hit better than we ever have in Arizona, and that's just going to keep getting better, because we hit against national caliber pitching. If you're hitting the ball well early [in the season] that's a great sign of things to come."

Sortino also feels that the team has a solid all-around game, and there isn't a lot of need for drastic improvement.

"We don't have any gaping deficiency," she said. "I think we maybe we need to string things together a little better, put our hits together a little better... but we are in every game we play."

First baseman Kim Gutridge and the UMass softball team will be swinging for a title at the NFCA Leadoff Invitational this weekend.

Knicks lose yet another center

By Chris Sheridan
Associated Press

PURCHASE, N.Y. — The New York Knicks have a new calamity — another possible season-ending injury to their starting center. This time it's Chris Dudley, whose foot will be in a cast until early April.

The Knicks yesterday re-signed 40-year-old center Herb Williams, who was traded to Philadelphia last week as part of the Terry Cummings deal and then was waived.

Williams and Cummings, not exactly the Twin Towers, are the only centers remaining among the healthy Knicks. And Cummings, along with new starting center Charles Oakley, is actually a power forward.

Dudley broke a bone in his right foot in Tuesday night's home loss to Golden State. He will wear a cast for the next six weeks, meaning a return for the end of the regular season is doubtful at best.

"Other than Herb we have no shot-blocking. None," coach Jeff Van Gundy said after practice, "but the guys we have now are going to be the guys who win or lose for us."

The Knicks also were awaiting word on an MRI performed on Chris Childs, who went down with what the team called a sprained ankle during last Sunday's victory over Houston.

General manager Ernie Grunfeld will try to find another player to fill Dudley's roster spot, but Van Gundy was not enamored of the choices.

"Unmotivated, fat, no game. No wonder they're unemployed," he said, mentally perusing a list that included Benoit Benjamin, Clifford Rozier, Dickey Simpkins, Kevin Salvadori, Doug Smith, Bob McCann and Matt Fish.

"I've done one fish trip. That was enough," Van Gundy said of Fish, a 6-foot-11 center who was signed to a 10-day contract and started once for New York in 1996 against the Lakers when Patrick Ewing was hurt and Williams had just been traded to Toronto. "That was the lowest moment in Knicks history right there," Van Gundy said.

Yinka Dare, dumped by the Nets in the Rony Seikaly trade and then waived by Orlando, did not make the list of potential fill-ins.

Neither did Xavier McDaniel, although Van Gundy is a fan. "That's a man right there," Van Gundy said of McDaniel. "That's a good name, a very good name. He's got no knees left, he's old. Perfect."

Whoever the Knicks pick up won't have much of a chance of breaking into a rotation that will include a starting front line of Oakley, Larry Johnson and Chris Mills and backup big men Williams and Cummings.

New York will often use a three-guard alignment with emphasis on perimeter defense to keep the ball from entering the low post.

"To me, it's would you rather have a 7-foot stiff or a 6-7 guy who can play? Because to tell you the truth, we're going to be undersized anyway," Van Gundy said.

The injury to Dudley came after the Knicks had been playing well following eight weeks of being weaned off the dump-it-into-Ewing offensive schemes.

Dudley wasn't scoring, but his rebounding and defensive presence were much-needed. The Knicks had won six of seven games until losing to Golden State, and they were still had the sixth-best record in the East going into last night's games.

Now, they'll be even more vulnerable against big opponents — at least until Buck Williams, who underwent surgery last week, returns in late March at the earliest.

Ewing is expected to be out for the season after breaking a bone in his wrist in mid-December.

Sports museum an athletic Smithsonian

By Joseph White
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Tim McDonough leaned over the basketball display case, and the memories came back.

"I remember the UCLA streak," he said, nodding at a jersey worn by Lew Alcindor in 1968. "A lot of this stuff is part of my growing up."

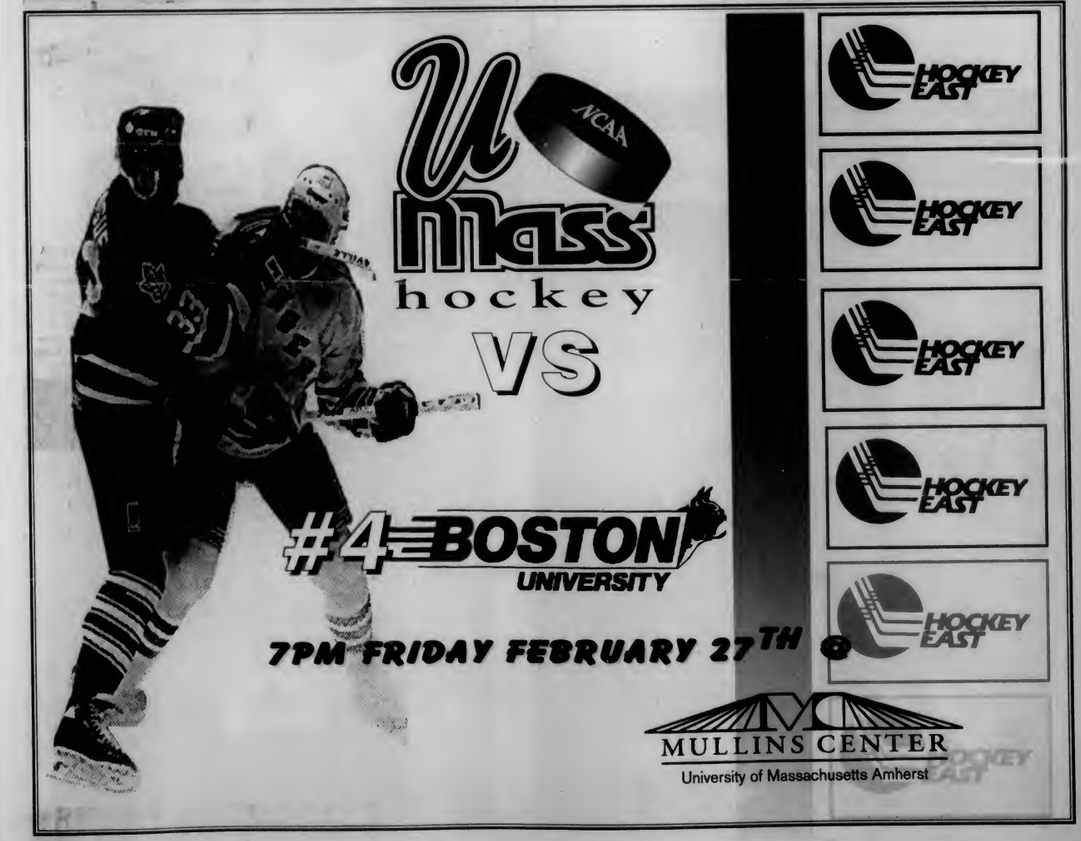
McDonough is a 46-year-old sports fan from Leesburg, Va. At the other end of the hall, he can turn a knob and listen to Howard Cosell tell a Monday night football audience that John Lennon had been shot.

McDonough's 10-year-old son, Patrick, is too young to remember Cosell or the Beatles. And, besides, he's too busy finishing a putt on an interactive golf game.

The National Sports Gallery, Washington's newest museum, opens today after a two-month preliminary run. It is located inside the new $200 million MCI Center that houses the Washington Wizards and Capitals and is just across the street from the National Portrait Gallery.

The museum is an eclectic mix of super-size interactive sports games and memorabilia displays aimed at satisfying fans of all stripes.

"We wanted to attract the young people by playing them interactives," said curator Frank Ceresi, who left a judgeship in family court in Arlington, Va., to become the museum's curator. "And then get them learning the history of the sports."



While most of the gallery's visitors are attracted to the games — some wait as long as 20 minutes to pay $3 to play a short interactive version of H-O-R-S-E with Wizards star Chris Webber — the few who do spend some time at the 20 or so display cases find plenty to hold their attention.

"That's worth about a half-million dollars," Ceresi said, pointing to a 1910 Honus Wagner baseball card. "Certainly, it is the Mona Lisa of the baseball collectible world."

The card is treasured because Wagner insisted that the American Tobacco Company card be pulled from the market soon after it was printed. Legend has it the shortstop objected to being associated with tobacco, but the card's owner, collector Bill Mastro of Palos Park, Ill., said Wagner had a more traditional motivation.

"The truth is, he wasn't paid," said Mastro, adding there are only about a dozen or so of the Wagner cards in collectible condition in existence. "He was the first major league baseball player who was paid for the use of his name associated with any product. If he wasn't paid for the use of his image on a baseball card by a cigarette company, he probably would have sued them."

All of the museum's items are on loan from collectors — except for a genuine Babe Ruth bat from 1926-29. A hole in the display case allows fans to touch the same handle the Bambino would have gripped while swatting his way into the record books.

JORMA KANGANEN / COLLEGIAN

Warren Norris returned to his hometown for a spot on the St. John's Maple Leafs after his playing days at UMass were done.

all change next year."

Unlike Wright, Norris has not had a problem with the increased level of foot speed at the AHL level, but with the increased level of decision-making speed. But he has not been able to fully grasp that change from his part-time seat in the St. John's Memorial Stadium bleachers.

This season has been bittersweet for Norris, and his hometown team has not made it truly feel like home-sweet- home. Yet, the Maple Leafs' top scorer, center Brandon Convery (the eighth overall pick for Toronto in the 1992 NHL Entry Draft), is rumored to be in trade talks, so the future might be brightening.

"It is not so much the skating for me, but your thinking has to get a lot quicker," Norris said. "There is not enough time and space, like you have with the big ice surface at the [William D.] Mullins Center, to do what you used to do. The players are bigger, and it is tough to beat them wide.

"But you're only as good as the players you play with, and the amount of time that you play. I still have faith in my ability to play this game."

Back To the Future

Unlike Norris, Wright will have to work off of this rookie season to get to his figurative sophomore professional season. His Ice Cats deal expires at the end of the season, and it is vital for him to prove to Gilbert and the Worcester coaching staff he is worth signing again.

Wright's role on the Ice Cats is not as vital as AHL All- Star Michael Handzus, but he fulfills a much-needed quotient in the game of hockey — tough, physical play. Gilbert is optimistic about Wright's AHL future, and understands he has had to adjust to both this level of hockey and a new position (from defense to left wing), but that adjustment needs to continue.

"He has to realize what his role is, and for him to excel and move on, he has to do that consistently," Gilbert said, with cautious optimism. "He played defense in college, and he's playing left wing for us, so he's trying to adapt to that. The college and pro games are two different games, and there's a lot more intensity in the AHL.

"There's a lot of intangibles he needs to adapt to, and it takes time. He'll be fine."

Wright's future hangs in the balance, and the rest of the season will prove if he is AHL material. Like every person who has dealt with the adjustment from college to professional life, Wright needs to find his niche in this game of games, and then make it work.

"It's a big adjustment from college hockey to the pros, and it's been tough," Wright said. "Playing every night is my job now, and I have to be committed to make it work. I feel like I'm getting better, and for me it was an easier adjustment because this is more of my style of hockey.

"Every time you step on the ice, there's something you can get better at. I have to take one step at a time, and hopefully everything falls into place."

Hockey notes: Along with the recent departure of Brad Norton to the Detroit Vipers of the International Hockey League, there are a veritable plethora of ex-Minutemen earning their way in the pros.

Rob Bonneau, who is second all-time at UMass in total points scored (72 goals, 94 assists for 166 points) has been making the trip between the Portland Pirates of the AHL and Hampton Roads of the ECHL. He was named ECHL Player of the Month this season, and has recorded 10 points for the Pirates in a number of stints in the AHL.

Three former Minutemen have found jobs on one ECHL team. Sal Manganaro (who had a brief stint with the AHL's Providence Bruins this season) has recently joined former teammates Keith O'Connell and Jaynen Rissling on the Richmond club.

Also, a number of this year's seniors, such as goaltender Brian Regan, defenseman Tom O'Connor and forward Tim Lovell among others, should sign professional deals after the end of the season.

Unlikely standout Carrara now star

Senior has made quiet impact over his career

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

Five autumns ago, there were seven cross country runners more highly sought after by universities than Holliston High School's Ryan Carrara. Publicity was fairly evenly distributed to the top three competitors in Massachusetts, but outside of his hometown, Carrara was a name in a roundup.

"He came in as someone who finished eighth in the state in cross country," Massachusetts men's indoor track coach Ken O'Brien said. "He was fairly good, obviously, but still slightly behind some of the more publicized runners."

Carrara tiptoed into the UMass track and cross country program following his senior year of high school, not attracting many headlines or much red carpet. In his freshman year, he was underestimated by opponents and overshadowed by his teammates.

"As a freshman, he was behind very talented and deep sophomore and junior classes," O'Brien said. "He was a very mature person as an underclassman, though. He didn't have to shoulder the weight of the team that early, but he could have. Over the years, as the classes above him slowly peeled away, he rose to the top."

Even last year, Carrara ran behind speedy Minuteman upperclassmen such as Matt Behl, Mike Maceiko, Jon Way, Walter Stock and Paul Blodorn. As opposing teams planned for the five seniors, Carrara quietly performed better and better, often times sneaking into the top places of the meets.

At the first meet of the 1996 cross country season at Iona, Ryan Carrara pulled in sixth place with a time of 25:29, second on the team behind only Maceiko. Later, at the Atlantic 10 Championships, the junior surprised the conference elite by claiming 14th place overall. His 26:22 time was third on the team, and his performance earned him All-Conference recognition. Still, the talk of the town was Jon Way, who grabbed an impressive fifth position at the A-10s, although his time of 25:56.6 wasn't as fast as Carrara's season opening output at Iona.

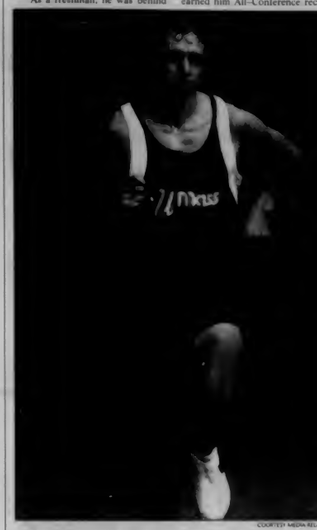
After the outdoor track season in 1997 ended, the five seniors graduated, and the Holliston High graduate found himself in the No. 1 slot — the leader of the University of Massachusetts's long distance runners.

"He's the oldest distance runner, and he happens to be the best distance runner as well," O'Brien said. "That's who the other athletes tend to look up to in any sport. Here's no exception.

"Now he's in the position to guide along the younger freshmen and sophomores like he was led along by the juniors and seniors before."

During the 1997 cross country season, Carrara, now a senior, met the job description perfectly. An unmatched work ethic and a strong competitive drive made him the perfect model for underclassmen. The senior consistently paced the Minutemen runners all season long.

At the Atlantic 10 Championships, however, Carrara was hit in the course of a few seconds with more emotional letdown than he had in years of being overlooked by the media. Late in the race, on a weather ravaged course, the leading UMass competitor fell. He had been in the thick of the top five places during the entire race up to that point.



"I'm sure he's disappointed," O'Brien said at the time. "But he's a strong kid, and he'll move on. He still has the indoor season to think about."

And at the beginning of that season, the coach, in his 31st year, offered a change for his premiere distance runner.

"The 1,500m is a relatively new event for him," O'Brien said. "He's a classically longer distance runner, like the 3,000m and the 5,000m, but this indoor season we decided to work some of the stronger faster races, like the 1,500m, into his workout. He surprised a lot of people with how quickly he adapted. He marginally surprised me. I expected 4:20 or 4:15 times, and he's reached 4.12 already."

In fact, Carrara has brought home several high places during the course of this indoor track season, including a first at a meet earlier in the year.

As Carrara has shown through sheer perseverance and maturity, it is possible to rise through the ranks and become a star. His strength lies in his competitiveness, his coolness under pressure, and his ability to bounce back from adversity.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Ryan Carrara wasn't a headliner when he joined the UMass men's running program, but as a senior he has become a self-made star.

Knight's outburst prompts Big 10 probe of incident

By Steve Herman
Associated Press

BLOOMINGTON, Ind. — One night his team is humiliated, losing by 48 points. Three nights later, he is ejected during a loss at home, then gives a scathing critique of the referees. Indiana coach Bob Knight's latest outburst is now under review by the Big 10 office.

The conference said yesterday it will study the Indiana-Illinois game in which Knight received three technical fouls and called the officiating, specifically that of Ted Valentine, the "greatest travesty" he has ever seen as a college basketball coach.

"We are aware of those comments," Big 10 commissioner Jim Delany said yesterday. "I think what we'll probably do is issue a statement about the game as a whole."

Delany pointed to the league's various rules concerning coaches and unsportsmanlike conduct: crowd incitement and undue criticism of coaches, schools, players or officials.

"So we've got four or five different provisions that could be applicable," Delany said.

The Hoosiers lost, 82-72, to No. 22 Illinois on Tuesday night, three days after they were routed, 112-64, by Michigan for Knight's second-worst loss since he came to Indiana.

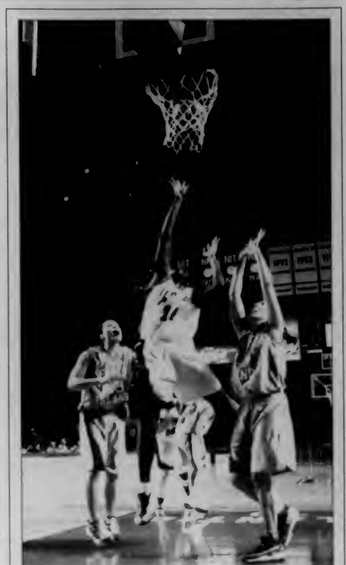
On Tuesday night, when asked if he expected to be disciplined for his comments — as he has in the past — Knight said, "I don't know."

Illinois coach Lon Kruger said an intense game can trigger an episode of this kind.

"I think early the officials were trying to keep some flow and call some things that I think need to be called more often in the league," he said. "I think the game has gotten to the point where it's too physical and not being played by the rules as intended."

Knight received one technical foul in the first half. He was ejected after picking up his second and third technicals with 9:37 to go.

Freshman Luke Recker was knocked hard to the floor and Knight thought Recker's shot should have counted as a basket because of goaltending. But the officials ruled no goaltending because Illinois' Sergio McClain pulled the rim, for which he was assessed a technical, and they could not assume the ball would have gone in.



"Well, that's the most ridiculous statement I've ever heard, because you can't assume that any goaltend shot is going to be good," Knight said. "If the ball is on its downward flight and it's interfered with, it's a goaltend. You don't assume it's going to be good, missed, not hit the rim, or anything."

Knight walked over to check on Recker, who was still lying on the floor, and Valentine gave him a second technical, an automatic ejection. Knight then flew into a rage and received the third technical.

"When I went out on the floor and walked toward Luke on the floor, my only comment was, 'I have an injured player there.' Period," Knight said. "I have every right to go out on the floor when there's an injured player on the floor.

"This, and that guy [Valentine], is the greatest travesty I've ever seen in basketball in 33 years as a college head coach," Knight said. "That goes beyond anything that's even ridiculous. This was absolutely, totally uncalled for. Just beyond belief."

Recker injured a rib and underwent further treatment by team trainer Tim Garl yesterday. His status is unclear for Saturday's game at Iowa, the Hoosiers' regular-season finale.

In overtime, Ketner's baseline jumper with under a minute to go gave the Minutemen a 62-60 edge. But James Singleton responded seconds later with a foul line jumper to tie the game once again.

With only six seconds remaining, Jonathan DePina fouled Winn on his way to the basket. The sophomore knocked down both shots to put the Bonnies up by 1-UMass.

But on the ensuing play, Mack's miss from outside the foul line was jammed home by Ketner to send the game into another extra session.

There, UMass raced out to a four-point lead. But following a Mike Babul errant pass and turnover, that resulted in a fast break lay-in for Palmer, Palmer cashed in on a three-point opportunity to put the Bonnies up a point, 69-68.

With 19 seconds left, Mack, who finished with 15 points and seven turnovers, knocked down an 18-footer to put UMass up 70-69, before Winn sent the Bonnies' fans home happy.

St. Bonaventure opened the game on a 13-2 run and held a commanding 35-24 lead at the half. Center Caswell Cyrus had a career game. The sophomore posted 25 points and 12 rebounds in 42 minutes.

The Minutemen didn't help their cause much, shooting only 35 percent in the first half, while committing 20 turnovers for the game.

"We can't keep putting ourselves behind and thinking we're going to win," Flint said. "We had so many opportunities to win this game, but we threw the ball away and couldn't make a free throw."

Horoscopes

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — Take care you don't underestimate someone else's involvement in a project today, or undervalue his or her contributions. Be objective, fair.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You must adopt a more practical attitude today if you expect to avoid the kinds of pitfalls that have plagued you in the past.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — What is most accessible isn't likely to interest you the most. Rather, you'll be attracted to what it seems you can't have.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You know more about life than others might think, and today you'll have the chance to share knowledge and your unique point of view.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — All you require is the proper forum, and the ideas you have to share with others will win praise, admiration and commitment.

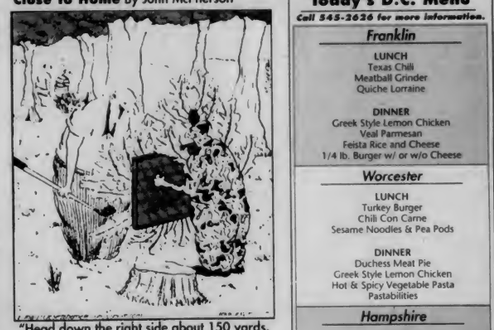
LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You may be after something — or someone — that is currently out of reach. Stay committed and you'll be able to do the impossible in no time.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You must be willing to look elsewhere today if a current situation is not providing you with the satisfaction you desire at this time.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — If you're waiting for someone else to do you a favor, you may find yourself waiting for quite some time. You must be willing to help yourself.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Now is not the time to show off in any ostentatious fashion. You can afford to be a little more down-to-earth in your presentation.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You are in the mood for a little more luxury today then you're used to — and you may have it, provided you're ready to assume the cost.



CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Take care that you don't come across today as sloppy, random or uncaring. You want others to think, rightfully, that you're fully involved.

AQUARIUS (Jan 20.–Feb. 18) — There is no need for you to be too rational today: an emotional response to the day's primary situations can serve you better now.

Through a season of ups and downs, three former UMass hockey players have made the move to

The Next Level

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

WORCESTER — If you want to see Dennis Wright get a lot of ice time in every Worcester Ice Cats game, you might be out of luck.

It is not that the former defenseman for the Massachusetts hockey team is not a good hockey player, but in his first year as a professional, Wright (45 games played, five goals, two assists, 117 penalty minutes) is still learning the ropes. The American Hockey League club signed him to a one-year deal this past fall, but he earned his job with a work ethic oriented more towards a job inside the ropes.

Against a college hockey system that punishes the player for overly physical play, Wright's hard-nosed brand of hockey was tailor-made for the professional ranks.

However, when the game is on the line, and the Ice Cats need to pull out a win, seeing Wright on the ice is literally a hit-or-miss proposition. He knows his job, but he also knows consistent ice time only comes to those rookies on the express shuttle to the National Hockey League.

Whenever Wright hops over the boards, he knows what Ice Cats coach Greg Gilbert wants out of him — hitting and hustling. Whether it is crunch time or not, the Palmer, Alaska native tries to be at the top of his game.

"I'm a role player for this team, and obviously, I'm out there to mix it up when we have to," Wright said. "For a rookie, sometimes the ice time works out, and sometimes it doesn't. Every chance you get to play, you have to be at your best.

"It's tough, but that's a part of the game and it's the way its going to be for me at this level. I have to deal with it, accept it and just work hard out there."

After a strong start to the season, Gilbert has noticed that Wright is getting a little behind on his development. To get that increased ice time, both admit there are aspects of the former Minuteman's game that he needs to improve.

"The thing we like about Dennis is he's a rugged individual, and he's not afraid to get his nose dirty," said Gilbert, who was a member of the 1994 N.Y. Rangers team which won the Stanley Cup. "He bangs and crashes when we need him to, but he still has some things to improve on, and speed is one of them.

"But he's a good guy to have around, and he has a lot of character and works hard."

The Next Level

Wright is not the only ex-Minuteman earning a paycheck in the pros, and two of his former teammates are dealing with this transitional phase of their hockey lives as well. Brian Corcoran (Hershey Bears) and Warren Norris (St. John's Maple Leafs) have also used their internship of sorts in Hockey East to make it to the next level — the AHL.

Against the spirit of "you can't get there from here," the AHL is a place where hockey players can hone their craft, and hope for that call from the NHL. But to talk about the AHL, one must know about the league.

The AHL is affiliated with the NHL, with the NHL parent club or clubs holding exclusive rights to players on a specific AHL team's roster. For example, the Ice Cats are affiliated with the St. Louis Blues and the Ottawa Senators, and the Bears are affiliated with the Colorado Avalanche.

Simply said, the AHL fulfills the same role Triple-A does with Major League Baseball: training players for the bigtime. The next step up for all three players is the NHL, and that gives UMass coach Joe Mallen a good feeling about what his program has provided to his ex-players.

"Truthfully, our record could have been a little better while they were here, but this is a sign that we've done some good for these guys," Mallen said. "This is a terrific accomplishment for these three because they were not heavily recruited going into college. To make it this far, and be one step away from the NHL, is a credit to them.

"On our part, it makes us feel pretty good to know that we did at least a good job in helping them develop those skills for the next level."

Football Hero

Corcoran's story is a very interesting one, because the former defensive end for the Minuteman football team — and an All-Time Yankee Conference selection as well — has earned his living in the game of hockey. The fourball star from Baldwinsville, N.Y. has left behind the pigskin for the vulcanized rubber of pro hockey.

"Being picked to all-time Yankee Conference team was a huge honor," Corcoran said. "Football was great game for me, and I miss it, but my experience in pro hockey has been fun, but tough."

After two seasons on the defensive line for the Minuteman hockey team (1993-95), Corcoran was signed by the Anaheim Mighty Ducks organization. He spent his first stint in the pros with Raleigh of the East Coast Hockey League, and the last season and a half with the Baltimore Bandits before signing a one-year deal with the Hershey Bears last fall.

The emotional roller coaster ride of the pro ranks has been felt most by Corcoran, who has had to weather injuries (missing 40 games last season with a knee injury) and the reality of roster "downsizing and reorganization" with the Anaheim organization. For regular players like him and Wright, this is the reality of their surroundings — unless something out of the blue happens to their careers, and the NHL comes knocking.

"Pro hockey is an up and down thing," Corcoran said. "Some weeks you're at the top of your game, and the next week you're in the coach's doghouse. The toughest part of it is keeping healthy for the full 80-game schedule, because if you miss two weeks, you miss eight games in this league, and somebody else takes your place.

"You don't know what is going to happen from year-to- year, unless you're a star in management's eyes, and you are getting primed to make the jump. As of right now, the NHL dream has become just a paycheck for me, but we'll wait and see what happens."

My Hometown

Norris' story has an intriguing twist to it because he did not just sign with any AHL club, he signed with his hometown club. The St. John's Newfoundland native signed a two-year deal with the St. John's Maple Leafs after last season. The deal guaranteed him the only other place he would go from there is up — to the NHL parent club, the Toronto Maple Leafs.

A great deal at the time, but now, it can be disputed.

High expectations abounded for Norris' pro career, as the rock solid centerman left UMass last season in second place all-time in both goals scored (73) and assists (81), and third in total points (154). The future looked bright for Norris, and he started nine out of the last 14 games of the year for the Maple Leafs after his departure from the Minutemen.

However, like Wright, Norris has had a harsh introduction to the professional life as a rookie. With three of their top scorers calling the center position home, the faceoff specialist has only started 17 games this season.

A two-way deal with the ECHL (which has the same arrangement with the AHL that the AHL has with the NHL) might have allowed Norris to get more playing time. At this point in his development, the NHL option in his contract is a long way away.

Recently, Norris has begun to see some more ice time on the wing, but it might be too little too late to salvage any constructive productivity out of this season in the shadows.

"This has been a disappointing year," Norris said, after a visit to a local St. John's school with some of his fellow Maple Leafs. "We are currently in fourth place [in the Atlantic Division], and we just have an overload of players here. One night you play real well out there, and the next night you're on the bench, so that makes it tough to get in a flow.

"The thing is I'm not playing myself out of the lineup, so its a tough situation to deal with. Hopefully, this will

Bonnies' Winn hits 3 to beat UMass in 2-OT

By Corey Peter Goodman

The Massachusetts men's basketball team has been playing with fire lately, and last night in Olean, N.Y., the St. Bonaventure Bonnies burned the Minutemen.

Bonnies guard Tim Winn hit an

NBA-range three-pointer with only a few tics remaining in the second overtime to give St. Bonaventure a 72-70 lead before an enthused Reilly Center crowd. Charlton Clarke's desperation three-point attempt was off the mark as time expired.

With the win, St. Bonaventure (16-12, 6-9 Atlantic 10) snapped a 20-game losing streak at the hands of the Minutemen.

UMass, which moves to 20-8, 12-3, blew an opportunity to clinch a first-round bye in next week's conference tourney (March 4-7). Now, the Minutemen will need to beat Temple in Philadelphia on Sunday in the season finale to sure up the bye and the regular season title.

"Our backs are up against the wall now," Massachusetts coach Bruiser Flint said. "But we had our chances tonight and couldn't hit our free throws."

The Minutemen rallied from a second-half deficit that climbed as high as 12 points. UMass used a 9-2 run early in the half to stay close. Lari Ketner scored a pair of baskets, and Weeks knocked down two free throws before Monty Mack's three pulled UMass to within seven.

Ketner finished with a team-high 18 points, while Weeks added 17. The two combined to shoot 15-for-20 from the floor.

With just over two minutes to play in regulation, Weeks — with a chance to give UMass the lead — converted on only one of two free throws to even the game at 57.

Rashaan Palmer's jumpshot at the buzzer fell short, and the game entered its first overtime.

UMass was only 6-for-13 from the foul line, while the Bonnies hit 17-of-20.

"If we make some foul shots, then we don't even go to overtime," Flint said.

It's UM–DU in A–10 quarterfinals

Dukes feature nation's leading scorer, Hlede

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

This year's Atlantic 10 women's basketball seedings were not decided until the final day of the regular season because the A-10 East title was still up for grabs.

Massachusetts (17-9, 11-5 A-10) had tied St. Joseph's for first place last Thursday with a stunning 68-55 upset win over the West leader George Washington.

The Minutewomen increased their win streak to seven games and clinched the A-10 East title on Saturday, defeating St. Bonaventure, 65-54.

With the win over the Bonnies, UMass earned the right for a first round buy in the conference tournament. The Minutewomen will play host to Duquesne (19-8), the A-10 West fourth seed, tonight at 7 p.m. at the William D. Mullins Center.

Sophomore Alison MacFarland led the way for UMass in Olean, N.Y. with 22 points including 4-for-5 from three point land. Junior Yolanda Rayside also stepped it up with 11 points and 13 rebounds to go along with two blocks. Massachusetts senior point guard Sabriya Mitchell, UMass' career leader in assists and a second team A-10 All- Conference pick, chipped in 10 points and six assists. The Bonnies shot just .319 from the floor and a disappointing .167 from behind the arc.

The Lady Dukes demolished Temple, the East fifth seed, 76-45, in the opening round on Tuesday night. Senior Korie Hlede led all scorers with 20 points, 12 rebounds, and eight assists. Kelly Eberhardt, Duquesne's second leading scorer (12.8 points per game), had 14 points and seven rebounds.

Duquesne is led by the nation's leading scorer in Hlede (27.2 ppg). A native of Croatia, she was recently named the 1998 Atlantic 10 Player of the Year. This is her third year as a unanimous pick to the All Conference first-team. Hlede is Duquesne's all-time leading scorer for both the men and women with 2,583 career points. Dan Durkin, the Lady Duker coach, earned accolades as the A-10 Coach of the Year.

In their last matchup, Massachusetts lost, 75-65, on Jan. 2 in Pittsburgh. Mitchell was UMass' high scorer with 21 points. The Lady Dukes put on a shooting extravaganza, shooting .614 from the floor. UMass was recovering from the loss of sophomore guard Kelly Van Huisen to a season- ending torn ACL. But a lot has changed since then.

The Minutewomen have responded well with the return of Tez Kraft, a third team All-Conference choice. She is the Minutewomen's most consistent scorer, averaging better than 13 ppg. Freshman Kathy Coyner has come into her own in the second half of the season. Competing in all 26 games, she has been averaging 6.3 ppg in 19.5 minutes per game.

Currently on a seven-game win streak, the Minutewomen hope to advance to the semifinals on Sunday against the winner of the St. Bonaventure-Xavier matchup.

In other Atlantic 10 action, the third seed in the East, St. Bonaventure, defeated the West sixth seed Dayton, 82-69. The West No. 5, La Salle, won a close one over the East fourth seed Rhode Island, 59-57. The West third seed Virginia Tech ran away from the East six seed Fordham, 79- 40.

Israelis indicted in training terrorists

BOGOTA, Colombia (AP) — Four former Israeli army officers have been indicted on charges of training Colombian paramilitary units in terror tactics in the late 1980s.

Also indicted Wednesday were two Colombians, the federal prosecutor's office said.

All six are accused of "instruction and training in terrorist activities" and face sentences of between eight and 14 years if convicted, the office said in a statement.

The four Israelis were hired by the late drug trafficker Gonzalo Rodriguez Gacha, one of the Medellin cartel's most violent bosses, and trained paramilitary units from 1987-89 in the Middle Magdalena valley, long a battleground between leftist rebels and the private militias bankrolled by landowners.

It was not clear why the men were indicted a decade after the alleged crimes, and prosecutors could immediately not be reached. One of the indicted Colombians — Luis Alfredo Rubio Rojas — is the former mayor of the town of Puerto Boyaca and is the only one of the indicted men in custody, the prosecutor's office said. All four Israelis were believed to be outside Colombia, although some local media reported that one had recently been spotted in the country.

Clinton mourns lives lost, wants satellite

KISSIMMEE, Fla. (AP) — Quoting from the Bible and stroking the hand of a shaken survivor, President Clinton mourned lives lost to Florida tornadoes and pledged federal help in rebuilding "brick by brick, home by home."

The president also voiced interest Wednesday in an early warning system that could use existing U.S. satellites to forecast tornadoes.

"Americans are praying for you and pulling for you, and whatever it is within our power to do to help you return to normal lives, we will do," Clinton told survivors and rescue workers. A $3 million Labor Department grant for temporarily unemployed Floridians marked the first of millions of dollars in federal aid to the state in response to the twisters that cut through central Florida on Monday killing at least 38 people.

Clinton, whose helicopter circled low three times over the Winter Garden area outside Orlando, held his chin in his left hand as he viewed the aftermath: an upended ranch-style house, its lower half dissolved into a wreck of shards shoved into the ground; an American flag fixed to a stubby pole in the lawn outside a flattened home.

"No matter how many of these I have seen over the last 20 years, I don't think anybody can fail to be moved and awestruck by... the lives and the treasures that can be taken away in a matter of just a few seconds," Clinton said at the destroyed Ponderosa Park Campground.

Single parents balance family, work and school

By Jason Eiseman
Collegian Staff

Evan Eisenhardt is like many other students on campus. He is approximately the same age; he has homework to do; he rushes around getting from class to class. He goes to the gym a few times a week. However, his priorities are in a different place.

When he goes to the gym, the first thing he does is place his daughter in the childcare center located on site. He takes her out after his workout, so she can watch him play basketball. He also lets her run around the court and bounce the basketball. Afterwards he may take her to get her favorite food at McDonald's.

Donna Harris is older than the average student, but she still has to worry about the same things. She must pass classes, she must get her general education requirements out of the way. But she has a burden that does not affect many students.

Harris has her own ritual before she goes to school as well. Some days she has to drive to Springfield to drop her daughter off at a friend's house, then drive back to campus, and later back to Springfield again.

Harris and Eisenhardt are examples of how students at the University of Massachusetts who are placed in extraordinary situations are rising to meet the challenges that face them everyday.

Eisenhardt, 20, is a junior hotel restaurant and travel administration major. He lives with his 14-month-old daughter, Alexandria, and his girlfriend Kelly, also a UMass student. Together they live off campus in the Townhouses. Until recently Eisenhardt worked 35-40 hours a week. He is also a full-time student, taking 15 credits every semester, and spends as much time as he can with his daughter.

Kelly became pregnant when Eisenhardt was a freshman. During the intersession of his sophomore year, on Dec. 29, 1996, Alexandria was born. At first Eisenhardt was worried, and didn't want Kelly to have the baby, but he said when his daughter was born she became the best experience of his life.

"It was the most unbelievable thing I've ever had happen in my life," Eisenhardt said. "I've never seen a more gross and beautiful sight in my life. It's the best thing that's ever happened to me. I look at every day as a bonus for me." He has had to do a lot of growing up in the last few years.

"I'm only 20, and I feel like I'm 40," he said. "My priorities are different than a lot of college students."

Harris, a 44-year-old senior hotel restaurant and travel administration major, has two children from a 24-year marriage. Now separated from her husband, Harris takes care of her two daughters, Raechelle, 18, and Desiree, 8, at their South Deerfield home.

In addition, Harris is a full-time student, taking 12 credits every semester, and working as many as 20 hours a week at Campus Center Catering.

Harris has been going to school for six years, first earning an associate's degree at Holyoke Community College, and then coming to UMass. She took a year off to spend with Desiree during her year in kindergarten.

Police arrest two men on multiple charges of vandalism, larceny

Two 18-year-old males were arrested Tuesday night after a University of Massachusetts Police Officer witnessed them breaking into a vehicle in an on-campus parking lot on University Drive.

Gregory F. Goncalves Jr., 18, of 175 Belmont Ave., and Eugenio T. Miranda, 18, of 118 Nilsun St., both of Brockton were arrested on University Drive on two counts of nighttime breaking and entering, two counts of wanton destruction of property, $250, two counts of larceny over $250 and possession of burglarious instruments.

The police officer on the scene "observed a car driving slowly through the parking lot. The officer's attention was drawn after the car had driven by many empty parking spaces," UMass Chief of Police John Luippold said.

According to Luippold, the responding police officer witnessed the two men attempt to open a door to a vehicle then break the window.

"Once the police officer approached the vehicle, a speaker and amplifier was found on the ground. After a short foot pursuit, the two men were found hiding under a truck," Luippold said.

UC 2000 meets to debate plans for SU renovation; First phase of discussions include computer labs

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

In the first phase of presenting plans for University Center 2000 (UC 2000) to the public, a meeting with Auxiliary Services and the UC 2000 commission was held last night to get input on the tentative plan for renovation.

"The purpose of this meeting is to review the latest plan that has been reviewed by students and Auxiliary Services," Beverly Wood, of Campus Planning and Space Management, co-presenter of the plan said.

Wood explained the purpose of the plan presented.

"We start with something that's everybody's wish list without economic parameters. Then we have to ask other questions. Hard questions and the building really comes down to the essential additions that you need," Wood said.

The plan is tentative but included many changes that came as a result of student survey's, workshops and focus groups.

The plan includes a food court and computer commons.

The computer commons would also have a coffee house and lounge furniture to create a comfortable place for students to go, Judy Steinkamp, of Campus Planning and Space Management, also presenting the plan said.

"[There will be] a lounge and coffee to make it feel like their in their dorm room," Steinkamp said.

There would be a student club where the Bluewall is now, having a satellite T.V. and pool tables Steinkamp said.

There will also be a theater but the location is not yet decided and the second floor will be devoted to RSO office spaces.

Concerns were raised about the plan from several members of the audience.

Some were concerned there was no guaranteed money allotted yet or guaranteed support from the Administration of the plan.

"We're putting the cart before the horse. We have an economic assumption [an assumption of] a level of support from the Administration," Marc Kenen, Director of Student Center on Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) which is part of the UC 2000 Commission, said.

Kenen said it was futile to decide on the plan because it wasn't within the power of the people at the meeting. He said the real decisions makers are in the Administration.

"Deciding is futile when we don't have all the pictures in place. I would like to make a decision and have them stick to it," Kenen said.

"A lot of people [in the administration] have been bent out of shape over this process," said Jason Vecchio, a member of UC 2000 commission.

Ric Townes, Assistant Vice Chancellor of Campus Activities was concerned there was too much space being used for retail and not enough allocated for RSO programming.

"So you're saying right now we've got the Auditorium and the Ballroom and with the new plan we've got the Auditorium and the Ballroom with some space added on," Townes said.

Steinkamp said this plan is temporary and there is an RSO programming space orientation.

"It's absolutely program oriented... This is just purely blocking out kinds of spaces it's not a design yet," Steinkamp said.

Steinkamp said it was not yet determined where students would go while the Student Union is being renovated.

"That is part of the planning process. That will come in the next phase," Steinkamp said.

Public health researchers investigate correlation between excercise & cancer

By Lorraine Kennedy
Collegian Staff

A one-year pilot study to help determine if there is a correlation between physical activity and breast cancer risk is being conducted by University of Massachusetts public health researchers.

Moderate to high levels of physical activity in women may lower lifetime exposure to estrogen, a known trigger for breast cancer, according to project head Lisa Chasan-Taber, assistant professor of biostatistics and epidemiology.

"Physical activity is a key element because it is the only modifiable risk factor and the primary non-chemical prevention strategy for breast cancer," Chasan-Taber said in a press release.

The pilot study is being funded by a $75,000 grant from the Massachusetts Department of Public Health. Chasan- Taber is working with three other UMass professors — Patty Freedson, exercise science, and Philip Nasca and Elaine Puleo, biostatistics and epidemiology — to develop a questionnaire to be used in a more comprehensive study which will follow if further funds become available.

The questionnaire will measure both current and lifetime physical activity in women ages 39 to 65, the highest risk group. The random sample for the pilot study consists of 240 women selected from Smith and Mt. Holyoke College's graduating classes of 1960 through 1980.

According to Chasan-Taber, the homogeneous group of women were chosen to ensure that the results of the study would not be skewed by other factors. In addition, because of their educational background, she felt the women might be "more motivated" to fill out the extensive questionnaire.

The study mimics the Harvard Alumni Study, a pivotal study of the relationship between physical activity and heart disease in males.

The questionnaire, which Chasan-Taber said may seem "a little daunting" at first, requires the participant to recall the physical activity from her whole lifetime, in 15 year segments. There is a physical activities checklist which measures everything from participation in active sports, to household chores and yard work, to the physical activity activity associated with caring for small children.

In addition, a small group of about 40 participants will be fitted with a battery-powered accelerometer, a device which measures physical activity, to be worn for a week. These women will also keep a diary of all physical activity, for further accuracy.

While there have been previous studies that have tried to determine this link, the results have varied. Consequently, said Chasan-Taber, this has become "a hot area" of research.

The long-range study will include graduates from the group of women's colleges known as the Seven Sisters. In addition to Smith and Mt. Holyoke, that group includes Bryn Mawr, Vassar, Barnard, Radcliffe and Wellesley colleges. Chasan-Taber said the women's colleges will provide the basic, detailed information needed by researchers which they will then generalize to the whole population.

Picariello and Toure give talks; MIM and RAIL speak against corruption in U.S. justice system

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Correspondent

Imagine for just one moment that you are being held captive in one of America's most notorious prisons and are being incarcerated for speaking out against the corruption of the political justice system. Now consider that you are cut off from the outside world; you haven't heard from your family because they think you're dead.

The prison guards have stripped you of your clothing and personal belongings. There you stand, naked, in a dank and smelly jail cell awaiting to be beaten and all because of your decision to speak out against the political "injustice" system; sound far-fetched and ironic?

The Maoist Internationalist Movement (MIM) is an extremist, revolutionary, communist group whose reform includes informing the consciousness of the American people on the injustices committed by the political justice system.

Two political activists, Richard Picariello and Kazi Toure, spoke out and informed University of Massachusetts students about their own experiences Wednesday night as a part of the Revolutionary Anti-Imperialists League (RAIL) and MIM's prisoners awareness week.

Picariello experienced the effects of political repression through his brutal beating by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology police force. The event, which appeared recently on nationwide news, portrayed Picariello as a violator to the security of MIT students. However, Picariello stated that he was waiting for an activist meeting to begin, when the MIT police approached and beat him on the account that he wasn't a student and he was "out to cause trouble." He was placed in prison for assault with a deadly weapon (his feet).

To this day, he is on a restraining order, and Picariello's story is only one of the many blows being dealt by the political justice system. In fact as Picariello stated, "the same

Talk discusses sex change

By Ken Tatro
Collegian Staff

Performing artist, actress and writer Kate Bornstein discussed transgender issues yesterday at the Campus Center.

Bornstein, who had a sex change operation a decade ago, began her discussion with a piece of performance art which explained the difficulties she has faced while dealing with the issue of gender.

"I have spent 50 years hating my body, but now that I am not a man I hate this woman's body," Bornstein said speaking to a room-filled crowd.

Although she hates her body Bornstein said she "feels pretty."

"I have given myself permission to feel sexy," Bornstein said, "I can stop traffic now."

Bornstein, who is currently promoting her new book My Gender Workbook, said her gender change was "an attempt to fit in someplace." She said the gender change from man to woman was a "big deal."

The performance artist describes her body as a "surgically retooled, chemically enhanced, transgender body."

According to Bornstein, people should look at gender as a question which has many answers.

"Am I a woman, a man?" she asked.

The 50-year-old author said it is possible to be both or neither gender at the same time.

"This is a man's body," the obviously female Bornstein said. "I am living out multiple interpretations of me. That is how we should look at gender."

Bornstein said there are rules which make men and women feel part of their gender. But, she believes in the concept of no gender at all.

"Spirits are genderless, maybe our bodies are also," Bornstein said. "We are the same jello mix in a couple of different jello molds."

Bornstein said that she grew up in a Jewish household in New Jersey but "found no answerers in Judaism. I didn't feel that God helped me."

"I have never had a God, not a real one," Bornstein said.

She has spent the last 10 years with the church of Scientology and said "the stuff works."

North Korea may run out of food

By Joe McDonald
Associated Press

BEIJING — North Korea expects to run out of domestic food stocks by April, leaving it again dependent on foreign aid that is becoming increasingly difficult to deliver, an aid official said Wednesday.

There could also be water shortages because of a mild, snow-free winter that came after a severe summer drought, said Kathi Zellweger of the charity Caritas, who returned Tuesday from a trip to North Korea.

"The lean period is still ahead of us," said Zellweger, the charity's Hong Kong director. "From speaking to the local officials, there was a fear that it may be even earlier than April."

Delivery of food aid has been hampered by the country's collapsing transport system, she said.

"Transport is becoming a problem — lack of fuel, lack of vehicles, lack of electricity for the trains," Zellweger said. "It takes a lot to move relief supplies from A to B."

Last year, North Korea also depleted its grain stocks in the spring, leaving it dependent on donations and purchases from abroad, and forcing its people to scavenge for seaweed, grass and anything else that could be eaten.

Flooding and drought have combined with years of mismanagement in North Korea's centrally planned communist economy to push the country to the brink of starvation. According to Chinese media, the autumn harvest produced only 60 percent of the minimum amount of grain needed to feed the country's 24 million people.

Zellweger, who has visited North Korea 15 times over the past three years, said thanks to massive foreign aid, hunger didn't appear to be any worse than during her last visit in November.

"We did not see severe or widespread malnutrition in the general population but there are still malnourished children in institutions," she said.

Magnifying the impact of the famine has been an economic collapse brought on by the loss of Soviet bloc aid and trade. Factories are idle, hospitals have no drugs, most homes are unheated and visitors report seeing no vehicles on the roads. The United Nations launched a new appeal earlier this month for $415.6 million in food and humanitarian supplies for North Korea.

Abenakis raise funds to combat deforestation

By Laura Jakutowicz
Collegian Correspondent

Yesterday a fundraiser was held by Tom Obomsawin of the Alsiguntcook Nation of Abenakis. The topic of the fundraiser was the deforestation of the Northeast as a result of landholdings by Champion International and Mead–Oxford Corporations, both large paper companies.

The land, which extends from northern New Hampshire to western Maine to northeastern Vermont was purchased in 1796 from the then sick and 96–year–old King Phillip, who was also unable to read English. Obomsawin has surmised that King Phillip was probably deceived as to the deed's meaning at the time of the signing. He died the same year.

"The deed was signed in 1796, which was 6 years after it was legal," Obomsawin said. The falsity of the deed is just one of several legal matters in the process of being addressed by the Abenaki community.

Since the land has been sold to paper companies Champion International and Mead Corporation, they have systematically been deforesting the area for a profit.

As a result the forests have thinned, disrupting the ecosystems and destroying the quality of the soil. The paper companies, who rely on softwoods such as pine, have also been conducting aerial spraying since 1988, in an effort to destroy all of the hardwood trees, leaving only softwoods for paper production.

A slide show showed the devastation done to the forests. Leafless and dying elms, birch and maple trees were shown among the living pine and fur trees.

Some slides showed the former forested areas which are now in many areas, large bowls of dust due to aerial spraying of herbicides. Other aerial shots showed how the paper companies leave a "beauty line" of forest which aligns with the river banks; behind it lies a wasteland of devastation, due to clear-cutting.

The Alsiguntcook Nation of Abenakis is now requesting funding to pursue a legal challenge to the companies who are destroying and deforesting the land.

"In the deed, we retained hunting, fishing and gathering rights and that was for [perpetuity]. In order to exercise these rights, we prefer not to eat deer and fish tainted with herbicides," Obomsawin said. Among the requests the group has is to ban all commercial logging activities on the territory and the release of pesticides and other pollutants.

The Alsiguntcook Nation of Abenakis is now raising funds to support a number of legal challenges, among them is to the Environmental Protection Agency for their neglect of this area.

"The reason we're doing this is to protect what's left of the forest" Obomsawin said.

NIDOBAK Incorporated, a non–profit organization, is now collecting funds to support the legal battles. In order to contact this organization, please write NIDOBAK, Incorporated, P.O. Box 184 North Stratford, NH, 03590. Persons interested can also call Thomas Obomsawin at (603)–922–4455.

things I went through can happen to any ordinary person who speaks out to end repression."

These types of activists are targets of criminal injustice. According to MIM, "there have recently been a reported 200 political prisoners and approximately a thousand unreported prisoners being held for political activism and crimes that they didn't commit."

Furthermore, this is evident in the recent increase of prisoners over the past years. The U.S. Justice Department stated, "the number of people in prison and jail hit an all– time high of 1.7 million in June 1997."

This is an increase of more than 100,000 over the middle of '96.

"As a result, the number of prisons have been fluctuating to an all time high and more money has been geared towards the prison system than the educational system in most areas," Picariello said.

So, what's the benefit of all these financial increases. Finances are coming out of the average families tax dollars and the money is going to the upper class.

With so many political activists in prison and receiving no education or job training, they get out of prison and have nowhere to go, but back to jail. And the money just keeps seeping into the upper class; as Kazi Toure stated, "more than 20 percent of the American population contains 97 percent of the American wealth."

MIM has organized a Jericho movement in response to the growing need for action. The movement will consist of a national mobilization to Washington D.C. on March 27 to protest against the government that imprisons people for their political beliefs. If any students are interested in informing the government of the need to respond to political repression and want to get involved, please call RAIL at 582–3934 or at rail3@mim.org

Some indictments in Bosnian war crimes trial too weak to stand in court

By Laura Myers
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A "significant number" of indictments of Bosnians and others accused of being war criminals are too weak to stand up in court, the top U.S. envoy to the region said Wednesday in announcing plans to focus on capturing the worst offenders.

"We are prepared (to use), and have used already, any and all available options to ensure the indictees get to The Hague," where an international War Crimes Tribunal is operating, said Ambassador Robert Gelbard.

Under the NATO leadership of Gen. Wesley Clark, Gelbard said the Bosnian peacekeeping force, known as SFOR, has become more selectively aggressive in seizing accused war criminals or in persuading them to turn themselves in.

The third Bosnian Serb suspect to surrender to U.N. custody for trial arrived Tuesday in the Netherlands after he was informed he was a target of the NATO troops, Gelbard said. That makes more than two dozen suspects in custody, compared with half a dozen last spring.

As part of the stepped-up program, Gelbard said the United States has begun reviewing indictments before SFOR targets individuals in order to avoid undue risk by going after somebody who wouldn't be prosecuted anyway.

"The United States believes that a significant number of indictments will not stand up in court," he said told a Bosnia forum organized by the United States Institute of Peace, a federally financed think tank. "We will not risk the lives of any soldiers or anybody else to try to apprehend indicted war criminals if we believe that the cases are weak."

In late January, U.S. soldiers led their first operation in Bosnia to capture a war crimes suspect as part of a shifting strategy for the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the Clinton administration, which had long contended it wasn't SFOR's job to go after war criminals.

"We believe firmly that the apprehension of war criminals does lie within the mandate of SFOR," Gelbard said. "More importantly, so does NATO Secretary General (Javier) Solana and the current commander, Gen. Wesley Clark. I don't think it's a coincidence that all of the sudden there have been apprehensions ever since Gen. Clark took over."

Clark replaced the more cautious Army Gen. George Joulwan. As for future apprehensions, Gelbard said, "We feel that it's highly likely that more such operations will have to take place." So far, the international tribunal has publicized about 80 indictments. It also has begun issuing some under seal to avoid giving advance warning to suspects.

Gelbard said local authorities are starting to cooperate more in turning over suspects or allowing their capture in implementation of the 1995 Dayton Peace Accords that ended 3 1/2 years of war in the former Yugoslavia.

Gelbard negotiated last autumn the surrender of 10 suspects to the war crimes tribunal by the government of Croatia, although three of the cases were immediately thrown out as too weak. This month the new moderate Bosnian Serb Prime Minister Milorad Dodik authorized opening a war crimes tribunal office in his headquarters of Banja Luka. Previously, hard-line Bosnian Serb leaders loyal to the No. 1 war crimes suspect, Radovan Karadzic, had shunned the tribunal established in 1993.

Rule may bar lawmakers from making extra money

By Jim Abrams
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Rep. Tom Coburn, a practicing physician, said Wednesday he would leave Congress before accepting a House ethics committee decision that bars lawmaker-doctors from making money treating patients.

"I'm not going to abide by what they've said," said the Oklahoma Republican. "If I can't resolve it I won't be here, period."

The ethics committee, after nearly a year of consideration, formally decided Wednesday that doctors should fall under a 1989 act that prohibits lawmakers from earning income from a "fiduciary relationship."

The law originally was aimed mainly at lawyers, real estate agents or insurance agents who might have a relationship of trust with their clients, but medical practices became an issue with the influx of more doctors into Congress in recent years. There are now eight doctors, plus a veterinarian and several dentists, in the House.

Coburn, who was elected in 1994 as a "citizen legislator" who pledged to serve no more than three terms, said he would appeal the ethics committee decision by asking the panel to reconsider its decision.

"I'm going to continue practicing medicine regardless of what they say," he said.

Since coming to Congress, Coburn has delivered more than 200 babies and he continues seeing patients when he is home in Muskogee, Okla.

"I don't care if I don't earn money," Coburn said, contending it was a matter of principle. He said lawmakers should be allowed to earn as much outside income as they want as long as the source of the money is disclosed.

He expressed frustration that the panel did not address whether he must remove his name from the office door, the bills and the prescriptions representing his medical partnership. If his name cannot appear with his partners, he wrote the committee, "there would be no reason for me to practice because I would have limited patients."

The committee recognized that doctors "need to continue to practice in order to maintain their skills, and perhaps even their license to practice medicine, and medical practice necessarily entails a number of extraordinary expenses, including in particular the cost of malpractice insurance."

My own space

Marigold Pascual

I love my apartment. I've been thinking about this a great deal, and I absolutely love my apartment. Okay, first I thought it was a piece of crap, but since then I've had some time to ponder my situation.

I found my apartment in one day. Well, more like two hours. I took last semester off to do internships and was out of the Amherst area. When it was time to come back, I had to contemplate my living options; I didn't have that many.

All my friends that lived up here were all set with their housing situations. They had settled in the beginning of the school year. Basically I had to find a place to stay until graduation. So my choices were to: A) live in a house with a bunch of people I didn't know, B) live in an apartment with another person I didn't know, C) live in the dorms (blasphemy! or D) get my own apartment.

Obviously C was out (though my mom said, "But it's only for four months!"). Not that I have a grand aversion to the dorms but I did Southwest my freshman and sophomore year and have since had a taste of the good life. It was off– campus all the way.

Next was the task of deciding whether "to roommate, or not to roommate." Living with people is hard. You go through enough processes when you live with a friend, but a stranger? It's all about idiosyncrasies: we all have habits that can get annoying. Like if I'm doing my work I like to blast my music. Or I'm super anal about the placement of the pillows on my bed and my futon. One of my old roommates used to drool when she ate. It wasn't anything really noticeable, just a little dribble here and there that she would try to suck back up. But these are little things.

Then you have the big problems. I'm not talking about the late night drunken impromptu parties (which, actually, were usually on my part) or bills or food or showering schedules. The big problem always, always is the significant other. Notice I don't say boyfriend or girlfriend, because if that was the case they'd only be in the apartment a friendly amount of time. I'm talking significant.

Since the purpose of my column is not to be a bitch session (well, not this time), I will be brief about my situation last year. Her significant other moved in, lived there (actually more than I did) and did not pay rent. But I shall digress. This anecdote was just meant to be an example of problems encountered when living with people. I didn't think that having to deal with a similar situation was something I was prepared to do for a stranger.

So now what? I was going solo. Apartments are expensive when you're not splitting rent. But, like mom said, it's only four months. So I'm paying twice what I paid last year — it's not for very long and the space I'm paying for is all mine.

And that's key. I can do whatever I want in my apartment. I can leave the place a mess, I can decorate how I want to, I can blast my music and television whilst I whittle away at my work. I don't have to feel guilty about a thing. I even painted my front door, Mexican tile green with a dillweed border (but don't tell my landlord). And I've never been happier.

There is a down side to living by yourself though: living by yourself. Throughout the years you get used to having someone there to chat with and hang out. And when it's not there, you miss it. You miss even the annoying little things that pissed you off so much.

So I like having people over. We hang out, we make dinner, we party. Then after a while, they leave. My place is still all mine, and it feels so good.

A bunch of us were hanging out at my friends' townhouse and we were all liquored up. Two friends had just recently moved in and one of them, April, was playing DJ. She was spinning sing–a–long songs when she popped in "My Life." And all of us sang it like it was our anthem. "…They will tell you you can't sleep in a strange place/ Then they'll tell you you can't sleep with somebody else/ yeah but sooner or later you sleep in your own space/ Either way it's okay you wake up with yourself… I don't care what you say anymore this is my life! Go ahead with your own life — leave me alone!" Billy Joel always knew just how to put it.

Letters to the Editor

Concerned and malnourished student

To the editor:

As an avid reader of the Daily Collegian, I find it very annoying that your printed D.C. Menus are continually satirized with unfunny and sometimes nonsensical humor. Whether it's a "Jimmy Hoffa Burger" or "Chicken a la Don King," there is no reason to poke fun at a very unfunny situation. And what is that situation you ask? It's the fact that no student on this campus can get a decent meal!

Here's the facts: the meal plan is unfair, the food is atrocious, the silverware and dishes are unclean, and the D.C. atmosphere is poor at best. At the end of each semester, I still have close to 100 (!) meals left that I don't even want to attempt to use up. When I eat a burger at the D.C., I spend the rest of my evenings "praying to the porcelain god."

It takes me five minutes just to find a clean knife and fork among the thousands of utensils which still have vestiges of the previous night's entree. And worst of all, when I come to eat at the D.C., half the time I feel like I'm eating in a "mess" hall.

Heck, even prison inmates get a fresh slice of bread and a clean glass of water once in awhile. So why then can't John Q. UMass Student get a decent meal for his $1000 a semester? How come every time I want a tasty meal, I have to crack open my piggy bank and run over to Antonio's for a slice of greasy pizza? Why do I have to be pushed to the brink of anorexia just to avoid food poisoning and save myself a few hard–earned bucks?

Now don't get me wrong, I'm not trying to point the finger of blame directly at anyone, but something definitely needs to be done. Our dining commons are the laughingstock of this entire campus!

Before we can have happy students, we must have satiated students. So Chancellor Scott, please remember all these things the next time you're eating a satisfying and healthy meal. Maybe someday it'll be you that chokes on a "Jimmy Hoffa Burger."

As for me, I can't wait until next year so I can finally get OCMP.

The dreaded Annan deal

Husseín Ibish

Those who follow Middle East politics closely have spent the last few months charting the slow and painful death of the U.S. diplomatic agenda in the region. The Dreaded Annan Deal has only made matters worse.

Over the past six months or so, a major diplomatic realignment has been taking place in the Middle East at the expense of U.S. interests. These include a serious Arab-Iranian rapprochement, thawing of relations between Iraq and the Gulf and other Arab nations as well as Iran, and unprecedented visits between long estranged Arab powers. Borders are opening, relations are being restored and high level talks are being held — many of which are reversing estrangement which are two decades old. All of this is in direct disregard for United States' policies.

The U.S.' Arab dependencies have essentially given up on the dysfunctional American diplomatic agenda. Recently, the situation has run wildly out of control, as symbolized in the contrast between the Doha and Tehran conferences.

The United States refuses, for domestic political reasons, to rethink its failed Mid–East policies, mainly because these policies continue to be supported by the combined weight of the pro-Israel establishment and the military-intelligence community. Instead, the United States concluded that it was left with only one option — the use of force against Iraq.

"Operation Desert Thunder" sought to terrorize the region, revive fading memories of 1991, and hoped that by shear luck Saddam would be killed or that this would prove the last straw that leads to a coup against him. Broader hopes were that a post–Saddam Iraq would create a new Middle East and send the regional kaleidoscope spinning.

In short, this is violence substituting for policy, which is why the rationales and explanations offered up by the Clinton administration have been so unconvincing, even to those with a limited knowledge of regional realities.

The United States therefore reacted with barely concealed horror to the Dreaded Annan Deal. Even if the Iraqis really have given Annan everything they claimed the United States, their problem is entirely separate from the inspection of supposed weapons sites in Iraq.

The hemorrhaging of the U.S. diplomatic agenda has not been stanched by this exchange. On the contrary, it is apparent that the United States was determined to attack Iraq under the flimsiest of pretexts. But, it was thwarted by the weight of vociferous international opposition, domestic doubts and anger, the inability of the Clinton regime to articulate their aims in a coherent manner, and a concerted United Nations diplomatic effort which the United States spent all last week trying to block. The Clintonites were unable even to get a resolution through Congress, let alone the U.N. security council. The whole exercise has been an object lesson in the limitations of American power.

The unanimous opposition of the Arab states (Kuwait excepted) indicates the degree to which the U.S. Arab dependencies have given up on U.S. policy in the Middle East. Their opposition clearly seems to have landed them on the winning side, with the U.S. reluctantly backing down in the face of Annan's diplomatic success. The outcome confirms that they were wise to oppose U.S. attacks on Iraq and reconfirms that U.S. policies in the Middle East are best disregarded since they are completely ineffective.

The U.S. position is, therefore, much weaker than it was even one month ago. Clearly the Dreaded Annan Deal is just another small part of an elaborate long-term campaign by Iraq to rehabilitate itself and get the sanctions lifted. Iraq has again brought itself, its unchanging government and its centrality (both geographically and politically) to the Middle East back into everyone's minds. That cannot help but bring forward the day when sanctions have to be lifted, if not de jure at the U.N., at least de facto in the region.

The Dreaded Annan Deal provides a clearer indication than ever of exactly what Iraq needs to do to lift the sanctions. Annan's clear statements that the weapons inspections need to be completed in a "reasonable" time frame is a crucial, if implicit, recognition that there has to be an end to the sanctions regimes. This constitutes a major breakthrough for Baghdad and is the aspect of the accord that most displeases the United States, which intends never to allow sanctions to be lifted on Iraq as long as Saddam Hussein remains in power.

U.S. officials have been at pains to back away as quickly as possible from the implications of the deal — that there now exists an understanding between the United Nations and Iraq that there is a clear path to the lifting of sanctions.

Simply put, U.S. policy in the Middle East has failed because it is too ambitious. It seeks to coerce the Arab states into accepting every American and Israeli whim without accounting for their interests, for example that they have to find a modus vivendi with Saddam Hussein's Iraq.

Post-Gulf War U.S. policy in the Middle East sought to move away from a traditional balance of power security structure towards a unified system dominated by a single hegemon. The results have been disastrous.

If the goal is, as Americans left and right insist, a functioning, self-enforcing, stable regional system in the Middle East, then a wholly new approach is required.

Existing American imperial ambitions are not consistent with this goal. As a result, the United States will continue to suffer defeat after defeat.

Leprosy hits UMass

Ken Mc Donald

Something happened in the Campus Center basement a few days ago that really opened up my eyes. I was sitting on the coaches by the bank machine, waiting for the USA v. Canada men's hockey game, when a friend came by. We started talking about sports, nothing really specific, a form of conversation where the information that was being given was not really important to anyone but the person speaking.

The whole time we were chatting there were two men lying on the couches next to us. Apparently homeless, these men were wearing old clothes, were pretty dirty, and gave the impression that they had been at sea for months and were auditioning to be the guy on a Fisherman's Friend bag.

Now, I have no aversion or hatred for such people, as some of us seem to have. As I saw one of the men drinking from a can of Campbell's soup, slightly chilled (in other words, "cold"), I made a point to ask him if I could change the channel on the television. For all I know, the small amount of respect that comes from being asked your opinion may have made his night, I don't know. I cannot imagine having nothing at all, not even dignity.

The point of this column is not about my awareness of the homeless actually being on the "sacred grounds" of our University; I have worked with the homeless in many places, including Boston. There's a field trip that will make you appreciate the food at Franklin D.C. Read on, you'll see what made me angry.

At some point in the conversation I noticed two other men staring at the homeless men next to me. They were standing quite a ways away, but by their name–tags I could tell that they worked for UMass. Yet, they did not come any closer, they just stood by the escalator and waited, for what I had no idea. They just kept staring and after about five minutes they started waving. Two Amherst police officers came down and began to harass the homeless men. I have no grudge against the officers, they were just doing their job. My only hope is that they took the men to a shelter or something equivalent. I understand and agree with the accepted policy that you cannot sleep in a public building.

Here is my question…

What type of a coward do you have to be if you cannot go up to a couple of individuals who should not be in a certain place and ask them to leave? They could have had the common courtesy to politely ask the men on the benches to move on. But no. These "fine" University employees did not have the courage to go and say, "Hey, you can't sleep here." Maybe I have been under the impression that leprosy was not a problem in the Pioneer Valley, I guess I was wrong. Clearly there must have been some contagious virus that was being radiated from these men who were trying to find a warm place to sleep.

Wait a minute, I was kind of close to them. Maybe I'll wake up tomorrow and not have a place to live. Seriously, I mean these state employees obviously must have had the training to detect such a "plague" at a distance of over fifty feet. What if they had not come by, I could have been thrown out of housing right there. If you two are reading the paper today, I would just like to say, "thank you."

What a pair of jack–asses; did these people think that the homeless men were doing this by choice; that they were trying to rebel against society by drinking raw soup from a can? Maybe they were alarmed by the whole Goodell takeover last year and feared that these two men were advance scouts for a similar seizure of the Campus Center. I guess that I did not see the potential danger of the situation, deciding instead to turn my back on them to watch a hockey game. Maybe I didn't think at all, is that such a problem?

But, I am thinking now, so here we go…

Even though we scoff at the food in the dining commons across campus, UMass students have it easy. I don't care if you are scraping up every penny that you have to come here, we are all still members of the privileged class, each and every one of us. Maybe you have a tough life back at home, maybe this is your home. Either way, the next time that you see a beggar on the streets of Amherst and you turn your head the other way, think to yourself: "What does it take for a person to have such a fall from grace?"

Honestly, I hope that none of us will ever have to find out the answer.

Ed/Op is looking for new writers!

The Ed/Op desk is currently seeking new columnists. The way to get involved is by submitting pieces for us to consider for publishing. They should be 600-800 words long, well-written, and have a point.

There are no restrictions on topics, but we are especially interested in pieces on campus politics, satire and work that takes an unexpected perspective. Editorials can be submitted by e-mailing letters@loiterna.oit.umass.edu or in person to the Collegian offices in the Campus Center basement. Hampden Theater production follows path of self-discovery

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

The Night Larry Kramer Kissed Me, by David Drake, will be presented by The Collective Theater Company tomorrow night at 7:30 p.m. at the Hampden Theater. Hampden Theater is located in the Southwest area of the University of Massachusetts campus. There is a suggested donation of $2 to $4.

The play follows the coming of age of a young gay man as he goes through several phases of realization and awakening.

Called "a one man tour–de–force," actor and director Eric Kerchner will be portraying David Drake. As an actor, Kerchner saw the role of Drake as a wonderful challenge. He also saw the role as a means to deliver an important political message around the country.

"The role is so overwhelming. Physically and vocally. I'm going to be doing things I've never done before (such as partial nudity and adult language) but the wonderful journey of self discovery this character goes on makes it all exciting," Kerchner said.

After the gay bashing that occurred in his home state of North Carolina, Kerchner felt that this was the right time to present this piece. He said; "I feel that the gay community deserves this opportunity to celebrate their own life stories."

When asked why a straight man would want to present this piece, Kerchner is quick to respond, "I think the straight community has to stand up more for the gay community and their needs and wants. The straight community needs to lead the charge for equality."

An Associate Director of Admissions at Amherst College and Kerchner's longtime mentor. Will Dix, is the director of the production. "It will be a lot of fun to see him [Kerchner] in my context. Eric is committed to theater and the power that it has to affect people I'm excited that we are bringing a show to the Valley, not only for people who have been exposed to the issues that this play brings up but for the people who need to hear these messages," Dix was quoted as saying.

The Stonewall Center, The UMass Arts Council, The GLB Graduate Student Organization and Residential Arts are the co–sponsors of this show. This production has also been performed in Greensboro, Charlotte and Winston–Salem, N.C., and Salt Lake City, Utah.

Tommy Lee in jail for spousal abuse

LONDON (AP) — Politicians and pundits arguing over the rights and wrongs of a knighthood for Sean Connery have left him annoyed. The actor objected to speculation that his knighthood was being held up because he once said he believes in hitting women and because he's a tax exile living in the Bahamas.

In an interview Tuesday on BBC radio from his home, Connery denies condoning violence against women and called the accusations against him "character assassination."

Alex Salmond, leader of the Scottish Nationalist Party, accused the Labor Party government of rejecting a Connery knighthood proposal because the Scots-born actor supports independence for Scotland.

In Malibu, Calif., Tommy Lee was in jail Wednesday for investigation of spousal abuse and wife Pamela Anderson Lee obtained an emergency order against him.

Mrs. Lee called 911 from their home Tuesday night to report that the Motley Crue drummer had attacked her, sheriff's Deputy Angie Prewett said.

"She had a very minor hand injury and some redness on her back."

Mrs. Lee had a bloody broken nail but declined treatment, the deputy said.

Lee, 35, was booked and held in lieu of $1 million bail, which is twice the normal amount because he's on probation for attacking a photographer last year. His arraignment was likely Thursday. Mrs. Lee, a former "Baywatch" star, told deputies the two had argued, but details of the argument were not known, Ms. Prewett said.

"It's a private matter between Pamela and Tommy Lee," said Mrs. Lee's publicist, Marleah Leslie.

Mrs. Lee gave birth to the couple's second son in December. She and the children were at home and "doing well," Ms. Leslie said.

In New York, Shawn Colvin picked up an award for her guitar playing and seized the moment for a big announcement: She's pregnant.

"We have a healthy baby girl on the way," the singer told a crowd Tuesday at the Hard Rock Cafe.

The baby, the first for Colvin and her photographer husband, Mario Erwin, is due in August.

Colvin was given the Orville V. Gibson Award, while John Fogerty was honored by the guitar maker with a lifetime achievement award.

Condoms are a fact of life, Drew Barrymore says.

"It's tremendously important that we communicate and educate," the actress said in Wednesday's Stanford Daily, the Stanford University newspaper.

"I wish it was as easy to talk about then as it is today," she told the newspaper. "My mother's best friend contracted AIDS when I was four, and died when I was six, so I was aware early — no misconceptions."

Porno "on hiatus," Tori on tour

By Kevin Monahan & Marty Keane
Collegian Staff

- Reports that Porno for Pyros has officially disbanded are not true. Singer Perry Farrell, coming right off tour with his previous band Jane's Addiction, is working on a side project called Gobbelee, featuring Rage Against the Machine's Tom Morello and ex–Red Hot Chili Peppers guitarist John Frusciante. According to Farrell, Porno for Pyros is currently "on hiatus." Mmm… sounds to me like the RHCP's vocabulary has infiltrated Perry.
- The long awaited new album from The Smashing Pumpkins, titled Adore is almost finished. Adore finds the Pumpkins playing along with — for the most part — a drum machine. Among the session drummers with a pulse performing on the album are former Soundgarden drummer Matt Cameron and Joey Waronker, best known for working with Beck. Ex–Filter drummer Matt Walker, who has been with the Pumpkins since they fired Jimmy Chamberlain will not be performing on the album. Walker left the group after they opened up for The Rolling Stones.
- The new album is not coming out soon enough for Pumpkins fans, or Virgin Records. The latter of which has filed a lawsuit against singer/guitarist Billy Corgan, bassist D'arcy Wretzky, guitarist James Iha and former drummer Jimmy Chamberlain. The lawsuit alleges that The Smashing Pumpkins has failed to deliver an agreed upon number of LPs. Virgin is accusing the Pumpkins of breach of contract, having not delivered seven albums, and alleges that the Pumpkins gave notice to Virgin that they would not deliver any more albums as of Jan. 13, 1998.
- Tori Amos is planning a small club tour to promote her forthcoming album From the Choirgirl Hotel. The tour is set to start in Miami on April 18. Details of possible Northeast dates are still pending.
- Officially disbanded are Brit–pop band Lush. Although Lush's publicist, Rich Holtzman, gave no reason for the breakup, it is assumed that the 1996 suicide of drummer Chris Acland is largely responsible. Singer/guitarist Miki Berenyi and Emma Anderson are working on solo projects and bassist Phil King has joined The Jesus and Mary Chain, according to Holtzman.
- The Beastie Boys quietly accepted the Patrick Lippert Award for Community Service in New York for their "Rock The Vote" benefit. Adam Yach (a.k.a. MCA) expressed his concern and thanks while admitting that he was undeserving. Michael Diamond (Mike D) and Adam Horovitz (Ad–Rock) had little to say as well. "I feel strange about getting this award and all the attention with all that others are doing In San Francisco and every where else about Tibet," Yach said.
- U2 is dedicating their performance at Sydney Football Stadium in Australia tonight to the late INXS singer Michael Hutchence. The four remaining members of INXS will be in attendance.
- Congrats to University of Massachusetts graduate Taj Mahal who finally won a Grammy after being nominated eight times. He won for his highly acclaimed Senor Blues album.
- The on–sale date for Radiohead's April 15 show at the Worcester Centrum has been pushed back to March 7. Apparently the folks at Capitol got a little too excited at the mere prospect of Bjork opening some east coast dates and let the cat out of the bag before anything was set in stone. Turns out that the Icelandic princess is a bit hesitant to bring her entire string section along for only four dates. Stay tuned.
- Closer to home, Pearl Street has announced two shows for March which should help to alleviate the pain of being stuck in the Valley for spring break as both The Cramps and Rocket From the Crypt bring their over–the–top punk fun to the area.

Oscar–nominee Carter shines

By Rob Roensch
Collegian Correspondent

WINGS OF THE DOVE
Directed by Iain Softley with Helena Bonham Carter, Linus Roache, Alison Elliott Playing at Amherst Cinema

Wings of the Dove is an adaptation of the intricate Henry James novel of marriage, money and morality set in the early 1900s, but despite the extravagant clothing and settings, this movie is far from simply luxurious. As the movie begins, we plunge into a speeding, shaking subway car and, after two minutes and several disorienting quick cuts, lovers are embracing on an elevator. No words have been spoken.

The plot concerns these two secretly engaged lovers, Kate Croy (Helena Bonham Carter), who is rich, and Merton Densher (Linus Roache), who does not have the money or position necessary to marry Kate. Then Millie Theale (Alison Elliott) arrives as a rich, unattached American girl who is dying. Millie falls in love with Merton and would, Kate presumes, leave all her money to him and make the marriage possible if only Merton could pretend to love her.

The only problem is Kate and Merton's honest affection for the kind-hearted Millie, and from there things get tangled in fascinating ways. The plot is like a reverse film noir — the morally ambivalent heros are challenged and changed by goodness instead of money and lust.

The two women own the movie. Elliott humanizes a role that comes dangerously close to saintihood. Her kindness is a desperate act, a last effort to leave her mark on the world. Bonham Carter is to costume drama what Steven Segal is to bonehead action, but her performance is neither expected nor ordinary. She hovers over everything as pale and fierce as a vengeful ghost.

As gorgeous as her performance are the colors, in particular Kate's shimmering, haunted blues contrasted by Millie's warm greens and thin yellows. Both the colors and Bonham Carter's presence are alone worth the price of admission.

If the Wings of the Dove has a flaw, it is that it tries too hard to be different from a typical costume drama. There is a reason costume dramas are typically slow: there is a lot to look at and a lot to understand. The movie clocks in at just over an hour and half, a minor miracle considering the plot's complexity. The pace is incredibly fast, and the camera is rarely allowed to linger over landscape or interior. It is a brave decision, but one that doesn't allow viewers enough time to catch their breath and sort out how they feel about certain characters and events.

The characters must have had time to think. the time frame is months — not days. But everything zips moodily by like one week where everything went wrong. All I wanted was a few more seconds to get to know Merton, a little more time to fall in love with Millie. They connect, but not as deeply as they could have. Only Bonham Carter's quietly ferocious performance saves her from also being swept away by the movie's rush to be unique. Her final scene is simply unforgettable.

Latest album not Van Dyke Park's best

By Bradley Skaught
Collegian Staff

VAN DYKE PARKS
Moonlighting: Live at the Ash Grove
Warner Bros.

There was a Van Dyke Parks "Best Of" album released awhile back called Idiosyncratic Path, and while the song selection hardly did a thorough job of encapsulating all that is Van Dyke Parks, the title most certainly did. Few modern pop artists have embraced stylistic diversity with as much enthusiasm and skill as Van Dyke Parks.

His masterpiece debut (Song Cycle) explored a kind of orchestral avant–folk genre wholly his own, the next two records (Discover America and Clang of the Yank–a Reaper) had their roots in the music of Trinidad. Next came an album about Joel Chandler Harris' Brer Rabbit stories (Jump!) while his fifth effort dealt with Japanese/American relations (Tokyo Rose). He came full circle in a nostalgic look at a mythical California with Brian Wilson called Orange Crate Art (Parks was the lyricist for the infamous Smile album). He also managed to score dozens of movies, make appearances on albums by everyone from The Chills to Ry Cooder, write a couple of children's books, and even make a few acting appearances (including "Twin Peaks" and Robert Altman's Popeye.) At the center of this creative web, however, is Parks own music. Among Parks' trademarks are enormous, lush orchestral arrangements that utilize everything from mariachi horns to steel drums and a lyrical pen almost sharp enough to be called poetry. So, with the release of a new live album Parks can only expect one thing: the unexpected.

Oddly enough, the unexpected this time around is a rather hit or miss set looking back on a career that, largely, was spent avoiding repetition. Not that Parks has ever been exactly an innovative musician. In fact, Parks is an interesting figure in modern pop because although he established himself in the heart of the '60s L.A. studio rock explosion, Parks own leanings are largely pre–rock, drawing more from the showtunes and Tin Pan Alley of bygone days then amped up rhythm and blues. That he manages to weld the lush sounds of yesteryear with a distinctly modern character is testament to his talent. Moonlighting, however, most certainly sounds like a journey back in time — even the cover is designed to look like an 78 record.

This nostalgic sheen is both the success and failure of the album. Where his last album, Orange Crate Art, was a nostalgic look back at a long lost legendary California, Moonlighting simply looks longingly on the very real past of Parks' own career. Drawing on every album, with the exception of Clang of the Yankee Reaper, Moonlighting focuses on the gentler, warmer side of Parks. This succeeds marvelously in the Orange Crate Art numbers (which are fascinating to hear sung in Parks' shakey tenor rather than Wilson's soaring multi–layered chorus), but it strips the tense, epic sweep of Tokyo Rose away by focusing on the minor, environmentally themed "Cowboy." A far better choice would have been the bittersweet "Manzanar" or the heartbreaking "white Chrysanthemum" — both superior examples of Parks' lyrical and melodic invention. Even the jagged, downright spooky, Discover America track, "FDR In Trinidad" has been smoothed over and given a fuzzy sheen.

It's frustrating, frankly, to find one of the best pop songwriters around so poorly represented. As a lyricist, Parks has mastered the art of being both sophisticated and accessible — complex and intelligent, but also quite thoughtful. His strongest lyrical work, from the Jump! album, is represented here only by the title track (an instrumental) and "Hominy Grove," which, though full of his usual clever wordplay, is rather slight when compared to many of the album's other tracks. Jump! was a stunning exploration, not only of Joel Chandler Harris' stories, but also of the rich African tradition that has set roots in the very heart of America's patchwork identity. On Moonlighting, Jump! merely becomes the source of an intro and a friendly toe tapper. Even more frustrating are a forgettable cover of John Hartford's "Delta Queen Waltz" and a baffling, throwaway novelty called "C–H–I–C–K–E–N." I had to check the cover three times to make sure I correctly read the songwriting credits — he did indeed write this ridiculous number. It's hard to imagine why Parks would set himself on cruise control with such fare when he has almost hundreds of dazzling little masterpieces in his catalog.

A few of the explorations work, however. Two pieces by eccentric composer/pianist Louis Moreau Gottschalk are lovely and engaging — perhaps Parks has found a kindred spirit in the legendary old pianist. Certainly Gottschalk, too, experimented with weaving the disparate styles together from old and new, north and south. Parks' recasting of Lowell George's "Sailing Shoes" (also covered on Discover America) is similarly inspired — one eccentric perfectly complimenting another.

The sun really breaks through only once, though, in Parks' rushed, loose, almost tossed–off performance of "The All Golden" (from Song Cycle). Without the full band and string section, Parks' marvelous piano playing is revealed, but so, too, is the real brilliance of his writing: seamless stylistic leaps; gorgeous, fluid melodies; dense, evocative lyrics — "The All Golden" really encapsulates all the Parks is capable of. It's only a moment, perhaps, but it's a moment that reaffirms all of the breathtaking artistic accomplishments Parks has made in the past 30 years. In sum, Moonlighting is just lukewarm — there are enough sparkling moments and stamps of genius, especially in the string arranging, to warrant a place in his catalog, but it's hardly a satisfactory look back at one of music's great eccentric, idiosyncratic voices. Let's hope this isn't the last word from a true American treasure. B–

Before returning to school, Harris supervised the Mini-Store in the Student Union for 10 years. After her husband left, she found she wasn't making enough money to support her family and began collecting her retirement money, and paid off all of her debts. It was at this time she decided to go back to school.

Budgeting Time

Harris arranges her class schedules around her daughter Desiree's schedules, and is always working to make sure someone is watching her daughter. Raechelle works six days a week, and so it is difficult for her to babysit her younger sister.

"I count on my neighbors to back me up," Harris said. "You're always making arrangements for rides, or day care." She said she is always trying to figure out her next step. "How are you going to make your next arrangement," she said. "I can't afford child care."

Harris said she has trouble finding the time to study. After going to school, making dinner and taking her daughter to gymnastics classes, she gets tired. But she gets by, and will graduate after taking a class during summer session.

"My daughters come first, and school comes second," she said. "School can't be my priority because I have so many other responsibilities." She said she is jealous of her fellow students.

"These students are my peers in a lot of ways, I'm jealous of the time these students have," Harris said. "After class, my math [teaching assistant] goes home and studies. I can't do that. But when I get that Bachelor's Degree that says I graduated from UMass, that's what's really important."

Eisenhardt has arranged his whole life, class schedules and working schedules around his daughter.

"You can't find time, you have to make time," Eisenhardt said. "Right now, any time I have free I spend with the baby." He said he finds time for school any way he can.

"When the baby's asleep I try to throw down a book and read as much as I can," he said. Since the baby was born, Evan has earned over a 3.0 G.P.A. every semester, but said he's not sure how he's done it.

Eisenhardt has scheduled classes so he has no classes on Tuesdays and Thursdays. He spends these days taking care of his daughter, he also takes care of the baby on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday after classes. He and Kelly have arranged their schedules so someone is always with the baby, so they don't have to hire a babysitter.

Eisenhardt counts on friends helping out, but it is difficult to find people who are willing to help out. He said many people offer to babysit, but only three or four people actually help out when he calls them to look after the baby.

Budgeting Money

"This semester I'm comfortable because I saved up," Eisenhardt said. He used to work at the Inn in Northampton, but is in between jobs now, and soon money will get a lot tighter. "Sometimes we'll barely be getting by, barely making rent."

Last semester, Eisenhardt saved his money for Christmas presents for the baby; it was important for him to make Christmas nice for her.

"I used rent for Christmas presents for the baby," he said. "I paid rent later, after I got paid for a job in January."

There are a lot of hidden costs with a baby, that many people don't think of. He buys a gallon of milk every other day. When she was drinking formula she went through at least two cans a day at $3 a can. He also spends a lot of money on clothes and laundry, which becomes expensive because she outgrows everything so quickly. Because the baby goes through two or three outfits everyday, Kelly has to do a lot of laundry for the baby. His parents used to help out with the rent, but now he is self–reliant.

"Now I pay for everything myself," Eisenhardt said. "We do everything on our own."

Money has been an issue for Harris ever since her husband left eight years ago. Since then he has not provided any support for their family. Her daughters have spoken to their father about four times in the last eight years. She said he's taken would not accomplish anything, because he has no money.

Harris receives welfare from the state called Transitive Assistance (TA), and she also works on campus as part of her work study program, which allows her to make ends meet. She said two years of TA will end in December, so it is important that she get her degree, and a full–time job by then.

"TA gives you shelter and food. Working helps with other little things," Harris said. "It's basic survival money. They don't give you money for your child to go to gymnastics."

She pays for Desiree to take gymnastics classes with money from her campus job. Harris is not always able to provide her children with these benefits. Several years ago Desiree wanted to take dance classes, but Harris did not have enough money to pay for the classes. A more affluent friend helped foot the bill. She said she is lucky to have friends who help her out in tough situations.

"My children have to make sacrifices as well. You feel your guilt," Harris said. When neighbors take their children to Florida and California, she takes Desiree to a local motel to spend a night away from home, and go swimming.

The Future?

Harris is working with advisors in the HRTA program to help her find a job after she graduates. She has confidence that the program is excellent at placing people. She said no matter what, her and children will be able to make it through the tough times.

"We survive," Harris said. "Where there's a will there's always a way, and that's how we've made it."

Eisenhardt said he worries about the future of his relationship with his daughter, but he is also excited.

"I made a promise to myself that I'd always be there for her," Eisenhardt said. "I want to be a part of her life. I want to make sure she's set for life. I don't want her to meet some guy like me, when she's my age."

He said the relationship between him and Kelly has been difficult to maintain because of the pressure the baby has put on them.

"I would love to get married and be together forever, like a fairy tale," Eisenhardt said. "But my life is not a fairy tale."

Hackers strike Pentagon computers

By Susanne M. Schafer
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Over the past two weeks, the Pentagon's unclassified computer networks were hit by the "most organized and systematic" attack yet, apparently by hackers bent on peering into personnel records or payroll matters, the Defense Department said Wednesday.

No classified information appears to have been tampered with, but the matter remains "a very serious, long-term problem," said Deputy Defense Secretary John Hamre.

"We have organized ourselves much more aggressively and more closely with the Justice Department to get our hands around this," he added.

Hamre said he was constrained from divulging too many details about the attacks because the military was working with Justice in pursuing potential criminal activity.

Hamre told a group of defense writers the onslaught should serve as a "wake-up call" for the military in particular and society overall, arguing that neither the government nor the private sector has done enough to protect sensitive networks from such attacks. He described the intrusions as "the most aggressive and systematic attack" over the past two weeks. It had "all the appearances of a game," and apparently was perpetrated by "a small number of individuals," he said.

"It was the most organized and systematic attack the Pentagon has seen to date," he said.

Hamre said the attacks appeared to be occurring at a time when a "hacker contest" was going on, but he did not say the contest originated or offer any further explanation.

He said the attacks did not appear to be connected with the crisis involving Iraq.

The intrusions were directed at such information as personnel records and payroll matters, he said, adding, "Our classified networks were intact and not penetrated."

Hamre described the attacks as "widespread and modestly sophisticated." Attempts were made to enter networks used by all the military service branches, and the strikes occurred at networks located "across the country," he said.

It isn't clear where the attacks originated or how many people were involved, he said.

Hamre said the character of the intrusions had "the quality of voyeurism or vandalism."

"There are hackers that enjoy breaking into peoples' computers just to see what they can see," he said, adding that the Defense Department appears to hold some "mystique" for hackers.

The individuals appeared to be trying to leave "trap doors" in the systems, Hamre said.

Also called back doors, trap doors refer to mechanisms hackers leave behind after they've broken in. They might break in, look around, cover their tracks, and exit, leaving the digital equivalent of a "key under the welcome mat" to use next time. Hamre said the Pentagon has been attempting in recent years to update its defenses against such attacks, but added, "We have to do a good deal more in this area."

The trade publication Defense Information and Electronics Report on Feb. 13 reported that attacks had been detected during the previous week at 11 military bases — seven Air Force sites and four Navy installations. The report said they were Andrews Air Force Base, Md.; Columbus Air Force Base, Miss.; Lackland and Kelly Air Force Bases in Texas; Gunter Annex, Ala.; Kirtland Air Force Base, N.M.; and an Air National Guard facility in Channel Islands, Calif. The Navy sites were Pearl Harbor, Hawaii; the Naval Academy and two Marine Corps systems in Okinawa, Japan.

The report also quoted Tony Valleiu, the acting assistant secretary of defense for computer, communication and intelligence matters, as saying that the current defense budget allots roughly $24 billion for those matters, including $1 billion for information security.

Women's water polo starts season in N.J.

By Casey Kane

The Massachusetts women's water polo team will start its 1998 campaign this weekend in New Jersey at the Princeton Invitational, where the young Minutewomen will take on some of the toughest competition on the Eastern seaboard.

On Saturday, UMass will take on Maryland at 10:15 a.m., Slippery Rock at 3:15 p.m. and Villanova at 7:45 p.m. On Sunday, the Minutewomen will face the host Princeton Tigers at 11:30 a.m.

UMass has a strong corps of returning players who will figure into the mix. Sophomore All–American Katie Grogan and senior All–American Andrea Vazquez anchor a lineup that includes goalie Peggy Nieves, captain Claudia Clement and Maria Velazquez and Barbara Hickey.

Vazquez, who led the team in shooting percentage (75.4), Velazquez and Nieves all have previous experience with the Puerto Rican National team. Hickey has a wealth of experience with the team, having joined the Minutewomen when water polo was still a club team.

Grogan led Massachusetts in scoring last year with 173 points on 91 goals and 82 assists. She was named the New England Division Player of the Year and selected to the Eastern Championship All–Star team.

"I want everyone to work on the things we've been doing in practice," first–year UMass coach Dan McOsker said. "I want to carry things over from the fall. Plus I want the swimmers to jump right back into the thick of things.

"Katie is probably our most experienced player. She has played at the national level, and she's from California, where the game is big," McOsker said. "She has a ton of talent and she's able to play both offensively and defensively. She's able to lead in the pool from end–to–end.

Marci Hupp and Sarah Newell finished their winter swim seasons at the Atlantic 10 championships last weekend. They returned to the water with the water polo team, but have only the benefit of a week of practice going into this weekend's invitational.

UMass is not completely unfamiliar with the opposition it will face in New Jersey.

"Maryland is the defending Eastern champion," said McOsker, whose teams faced the Terrapins during the fall season. "Slippery Rock is the powerhouse of the East, they have been for like 500 years. They won the national championship about six years ago. So this weekend's field has some strong talent."

Betsy Colucci and the Massachusetts women's gymnastics team face a stiff challenge this weekend in Alabama.

Alabama getaway for women's gym

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

West Virginia put together a tremendous meet to dispose of the Massachusetts women's gymnastics team last weekend.

This weekend, it doesn't get any easier for the No. 25 Minutewomen.

Massachusetts coach Dave Kuzara rounds up the troops and heads down to Tuscaloosa, Ala. to take on their stiffest competition of the regular season in No. 3 Alabama, No. 11 Arizona State, and No. 22 North Carolina State. In this quad–meet, the Minutewomen have the odds against them to win the meet, but will let it all hang out against three nationally ranked opponents.

UMass is 8–1 on the season, after splitting the home tri– meet and suffering their first loss to the hands of the No. 9 Mountaineers. The team score of 193.075 represents the second–best performance thus far in the season, but it wasn't enough to knock off WVU. Despite freshman Jill Fisher's outstanding perfect score on the floor routine, the Mountaineers were just too tough.

Saturday's quad–meet represents the final multi–team meet on the season. They finish out with a home date against cross–state rival Northeastern and then Michigan on the road, before tackling the Atlantic 10 championships in March. The Northeastern meet will mark the final home match for seniors Penny LeBeau and Karen Maurer.

In last weekend's split, LeBeau and junior Betsy Colucci both had career–high scores on vault. LeBeau finished second with a 9.85 and Colucci third with a 9.825. Freshman Jobi Goldberg's 9.8 on the uneven bars placed her third.

Junior Anita Sanyal's winning ways were doused, finishing third in the all–around behind two Mountaineers.

Two years ago, UMass went to take on the No. 1 Crimson Tide in Alabama and left with a five point defeat. This time around, the Crimson Tide are coming off a loss to top– ranked Georgia in an SEC dual meet in Athens.

Fisher's 10 was the second all–time in UMass history and the first in Amherst. Tammy Marshall notched her perfect score in the 1993 NCAA championships.

On the year, the Minutewomen are averaging a stellar 191.570, but will need great performances from the entire squad that to come away with a victory over the three national powers.

UMass men's track teams heads to Boston for N.E. championships

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's indoor track team will return to Boston this weekend for the fourth time to compete in the New England Regional Championships. The meet comes just one week after the Minutemen placed fifth overall at the Atlantic 10 Championships at the University of Rhode Island in Kingston.

The fifth place performance was one of several possibilities expected by the team's coaching staff going into the meet. Out of all the possible scenarios, though, the fifth place finish was the one that the coaches wanted least, considering that second was not out of their reach.

The upcoming New England Championships will give UMass a way to forget the disappointing conference championships and move on.

"In one respect, it's good to have these meets coming at you fast and furious, because if you have a bad day, like we did Saturday, you have a chance to clean the slate and try again," Massachusetts coach Ken O'Brien said.

Luckily, not the entire slate needs to be cleaned, as a handful of Minutemen will head into this weekend's affair with strong performances last week to propel them.

Pole vaulter Albie Vasquez will enter the meet proudly bearing the conference championship, a distinction he has possessed for two straight years. At last weekend's event in Rhode Island, the junior cleared 14–feet–9–inches, tying his own school record and defeating two strong Virginia Tech vaulters, both representing the eventual overall team conference champions.

Another competitor worth noting was hurdler Ben Baraldi, who continued his stellar season by placing third in the 55– meter hurdles.

"Baraldi's third in the hurdles was a good performance in a good field," O'Brien said.

After this weekend's New England Championships, the quickest runners, the strongest throwers, and the longest jumpers will continue on to the 1C4A's on March 7 at Ithaca, NY.

UMass skiers head to Vermont to compete in NCAA regionals

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

If one term could summarize the performance of the Massachusetts men's skiing squad in their 1998 campaign, it would be consistency.

Having finished among the top three teams in their league in almost every event of every meet this season, the Minutemen surprised no one with their impressive third and fourth–place showings in the giant slalom and slalom respectively at last weekend's United States College Ski Association (USCSA) Regional Meet in Waterville Valley, N.H.

Perhaps UMass coach Bill MacConnell put it best when he predicted how his men's team would perform last weekend.

"We've been solid all season and this weekend finish right around the same spots in all of our meets," said the 38–year coaching veteran. "We have the potential to win it all. All of the competition is within our league."

After their impressive display last week, the next stop for the UMass skiers will be Middlebury Snow Bowl, Vermont, where they enter this weekend's NCAA Regionals with a full head of steam.

Unlike the USCSA Regionals, only a select few from both UMass squads will be able to partake in this weekend's competition based on the sum of their performances during the regular season campaign. Junior Tom Holden, and seniors Eric McCormack and Leah Mulitero will represent UMass in the hope of qualifying for the NCAA Nationals.

opportunities, hitting five.

Duquesne had trouble hitting their shots from the field, which prevented them from fully overcoming UMass' zone defense.

"The name of the game when you're playing against a zone defense and you're not a power team, which we're not, is to hit some 3's," Duquesne head coach Dan Durkin said. "We didn't hit the 3's when we had to hit the 3's I thought we were a better team coming up here, we just didn't connect against the zone."

The Minutewomen will now play Xavier on Sunday at 6 p.m. George Washington will take on Virginia Tech in the other semifinal game, scheduled for 8 p.m.

was more than consistent and broad scoring efforts that has been putting UMass in the winner's circle lately.

It's the little things. Freshman Kathy Coyner netted eight points, but she also had two rebounds and three assists. It's Lucia Madajova, who played just five minutes but grabbed three rebounds. The team also shot a consistent 24–of–29 from the free throw line with seven players going behind the stripe.

And then there's the two captains leading the team in spirit and in play as they finish out their collegiate careers.

"They kind of willed everybody on this team to have the attitude we're not losing," O'Brien said of the duo's influence. "Whatever it takes to win that's what we've got to do."

forting to know that your goalie can make the saves, but we can't put all the onus on John. The defense has to control their guys and the offense needs to find the net."

The Minutemen also have a talented crop of underclassmen, several of whom Cannella said will immediately figure into the UMass mix.

"I'm very happy with the way the younger guys are adjusting to the college game," Cannella said. "We have several who will challenge for playing time right away. Jeremy Guski (midfield), John Madigan (attack), Chris Gabrielli (defense) and Keith Gabrielli (midfield) have all looked good in practice."

In addition, defenseman David Breza and Rich Kunkel (attack) will challenge for time.

Because the season is so young, this weekend's challenge is a bit of a mystery.

"I don't know much about Holy Cross," Cannella said. "I know they have a new coach who's been there a couple of years. He's done a good job recruiting."

However, according to the coach, the focus won't be on the opposition, but instead on UMass' own development.

"I want to see smart play, controlled aggressiveness, a strong mental game and an unselfish game on both offense and defense," Cannella said. "We were wavering, going up and down, during our scrimmages. I want them to be hungry. I want them to want it, to play hard for 60 minutes."

goals against) are capable of shutting down any opponent on any given night.

On the UMass side of things, freshman Nick Stephens, the reigning Hockey East rookie of the week, Dan Juden, and Dean Cappasale all stepped up last weekend and added offensive spark.

And once again, it will take a solid team effort with total intensity to put UMass over the top. But a lack of intensity is something that the Minutemen seniors won't allow to happen, as this squad has yet to beat BU during their four– year careers.

"One of our team goals is to beat every team in the league at least once, especially for our seniors, because we haven't beaten BU yet," Regan said.

And if Regan and the Minutemen have anything to say about it, that comment will no longer be accurate after this weekend.

Sales reaches milestone; Sox suffer blow

Connecticut Lady Husky Nykesha Sales got the sale of the century on Tuesday night.

Sales is a tremendous hoopster, no doubt, but Tuesday's game against Villanova may mark her career forever.

Sales was merely one point away from shattering the Huskies' all–time scoring mark when she went down with a torn right Achilles' tendon. Two points. One basket. Let the controversy begin.

Before Tuesday's Big East clash even started, a master plan was con-

Around the Horn
Brett Mauser

trived to put Sales on top, despite her inability to walk. UConn head coach Geno Auriemma and good friend and coaching colleague, Villanova's Harry Perrette, decided to give something back to the senior who helped the Huskies to an undefeated championship season in 1995 and has had an immeasurable impact on Husky hoops.

How nice.

In this plan, the rules were bent and the ethics of basketball were questioned.

Rules state that a starter must remain in the game until the game's first whistle. Ah–hah, but not in the case of an injury. Senior Kelley Hunt started the game on Senior Night, faked some ridiculous injury, and left the game in favor of Sales, all before the opening tip.

After all was said and done, Sales got her deuce, scoring more points than any other Husky has in the school's storied history of women's basketball. She was immediately replaced by Hunt after the Huskies called timeout, leaving the game to a roaring crowd. Villanova was then allowed a free layup to even things up at 2–2.

Kerry Bascom, the previous leader and current New Hampshire assistant coach, now gets to be second best. She stated she was happy for Sales, but I have a feeling there may have been a little something behind that statement.

After all, second place is second place. Runner–ups are forgotten people. They get parting gifts on game shows. In 20 years, when another Husky is in pursuit of the career scoring title, reporters will say that she's chasing Sales, rather than Bascom.

•The Boston Red Sox are instantly in the hunt in the American League East with the signing of National League Cy Young Award winner Pedro Martinez and veteran Dennis Eckersley. Pitching was the only thing that kept the Red Sox from the playoffs last year.

With the season only a month away, the Red Sox suffered a huge blow when second baseman Jeff Frye went down with a torn anterior cruciate ligament, which will likely keep him out of action for the year.

Two years ago, it might not have been a big deal. Frye was platooning at second base with Billy Ripken in Arlington. Today, his loss is like losing the corner piece when trying to complete a puzzle.

•All of a sudden, the Sox are turning to raw minor leaguers and stocky veterans to fill starting roles. Journeyman Mike Gallego, who was picked up in the off season, might be looked to to fill the void at second. But this Athletic is long past his prime. Gallego might not be able to get to a ground ball up the middle, one that a healthy Frye could.

Management in Boston has that in mind, as they look for help elsewhere. The Braves' Mark Lemke and offensive– minded Greg Gagne are two names that are popping up.

•In college basketball, sound basketball is essential to achieve victory.

Looking at the box score for UMass's 72–70 loss in double overtime to St. Bonaventure looks deceiving. The Minutemen outshot the Bonnies, they outrebounded the Bonnies, sounds like a victory, right?

Wrong. the Minutemen shot a horrendous 43 percent from the free throw line (6 for 14), while the Bonnies hit 18 of 21 from the charity stripe. Granted, the Reilly Center down in beautiful Olean, N.Y., is a hostile environment, but missed free throws were the difference.

This futility has been a problem dating back to the double overtime thriller at the Mullins Center against Rhode Island. It they hit their free throws, they win. It's that simple. So Minutemen, for the love of God, sink your free throws. The tournament is going to come calling in a couple of weeks and victory is so much sweeter than defeat.

Minutewomen move on to A–10 semis

By Jackie Leroux
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team is going to the Atlantic 10 semifinals. After defeating Duquesne (19–9, 11–6) last night 63–47 in the A–10 quarterfinals, the Minutewomen advanced to the next round of the tournament, and earned the right to host the semifinal and championship games.

The Minutewomen pulled together a solid defensive performance to overcome a poor shooting night and managed to contain the nation's second leading score in Korie Hlede.

Junior forward Tez Kraft scored a team–high 20 points, and chipped in five rebounds. Senior forward Kara Tudman had her second career double–double with a career high 14 rebounds, along with 10 points. UMass out–rebounded the Lady Dukes 41–34.

"I think the defensive effort was wonderful," said Massachusetts coach Joanie O'Brien. "I don't think the offensive game was as pretty as I would have liked, but you take what you get, and you do the best with what you have, and we got done tonight what we needed to get done."

Duquesne had been led all season by senior guard and Atlantic 10 Player of the Year Korie Hlede. A native of Zagreb, Croatia, Hlede averaged 27.5 points per game this season, behind only Tennessee's Chamique Holdsclaw for top scorers in the nation. The Minutewomen were able to hold her below her average, allowing her a mere 23. Despite several flashes of brilliancy, the senior was unable to hit big shots for the Lady Dukes down the stretch, hitting 10–of–27 from the field.

"I knew going into this game that Korie Hlede is a heck of a player," said O'Brien. "She's done a great job for them, and you know coming in that a kid like that can really make a team go... She got 23 points, but Korie earned every shot she made tonight."

The final score was UMass' biggest lead of the game, as they were never able to completely pull away from Duquesne until the final minutes. Duquesne only held the lead once throughout the entire game, however, when they held a one point advantage at the 11:02 mark in the second half. They went on a 19–10 run to begin the second half and chipped away at UMass' 30–22 halftime lead. Hlede had 11 points in the run, including the jumper that gave her the team the lead.

Duquesne's advantage was quickly erased however with a layup from freshman guard Kathy Coyner. The layup started the Minutewomen on an 8–0 run of their own that put them back on top 50–41 with 5:25 left to play. From there UMass won the game at the free throw line, converting on nine of eleven attempts. The Minutewomen held a drastic advantage at the line throughout the game, hitting on 24 of 29 chances, while the Lady Dukes got just seven

Behind the strong play of Kara Tudman the UMass women's basketball team advanced to an A–10 tourney semifinal matchup with Xavier on Sunday at 6 p.m. at the Mullins Center.

Duquesne no match for UMass

Team is still not spelled Hlede.

In a repeat matchup of last year's Atlantic 10 quarterfinal, the Massachusetts women's basketball team (18–9, 1–7 A–10) put forth a full throttle effort tonight to beat Duquesne (19–9 11–6).

Despite the pre–game fuss of senior A–10 Player of the Year Korie Hlede averaging 27.2 points per game — good for second in the nation — the rest of her team, only three other players, contributed 24 points as she amassed 23 points. Junior Kelly Eberhardt added a near double–double with 13 points and nine rebounds. The other two Lady Duke scorers were junior Maja Kauzlaric, who rung up seven points to go along with seven rebounds, and LynnDee Howell, who chipped in four points.

While UMass focused on handling the torrid Hlede, the Croatian Sensation, who had 15 points in the second half, they didn't allow the rest of the team to take advantage. The rest of Duquesne, accustomed to creeping out of Hlede's shadow when she's double and triple–teamed, remained dormant throughout the game as they shot 38 percent from the floor and 10 percent from behind the three–point arc.

The Minutewomen were effective in not allowing the Croatian native to get the ball in her hands as she could only convert four of 16 shots in the first half.

UMass, on the other hand, was handily steadfast in the rotation of players and shooters. Junior Tez Kraft and senior captain Sabriya Mitchell led the way as Kraft had 12 points and Mitchell had five points and six assists in the first half. Senior captain Kara Tudman was on her way to her second career double–double with a career–high 14 rebounds and 10 points.

The reason for UMass' eight game winning streak in their depth. There are no Korie Hledes who can take over every game for Massachusetts. But that's the beauty of this year's team and the troubling part for the rest their opponents. The other team never knows who's going to step it up.

"The best day is when she's graduating so I'll know she's out of there," coach Joanie O'Brien said of Hlede. "Korie earned every point that she got tonight."

Duquesne's focus was shutting down UMass' most consistent scorer, Kraft. But they undermined the rest of the team as sophomore Alison MacFarland chipped in seven points, and freshman Kara Trent tallied six points. But it

Men's lacrosse meets HC in early season opener

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

In the odd years of this decade, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team has made the 12–member field of the NCAA tournament. The even years have not been as fortunate.

Tomorrow at Omni Turf Field in Worcester, the Minutemen will start the road toward a berth in the 1998 field with a game against Holy Cross.

"We want to find consistency, we want to get back to the NCAA quarterfinals," said UMass coach Greg Cannella, who guided his team to a second–round tourney game against Princeton last season.

Because this is the first year UMass has a AstroTurf surface to practice on, the Holy Cross game marks the earliest the Minutemen have taken the field during the regular season. In years past, the athletes have practiced in the gymnasium in Boyden Building.

"It's just been so much more fun coming out here, instead of going upstairs and choking on dust," goalie John Kasselakis said.

Though he and his players are excited about the season start, Cannella is not taking the Crusaders lightly.

"What scares me is this is the earliest we've ever started. Hopefully we'll be prepared. But we have to go down there and play Holy Cross on their field. We're looking forward to it," Cannella said. "It used to be that everyone else was two games into the season before we even started.

"When you start the last week in January and you start seeing scores, there is some anxiety when you're still waiting to play. This is a nice change because it puts us more on even footing."

And it's not that the Minutemen are inexperienced either. UMass returns a pair of double–digit goal scorers in senior co–captain Mike DelPercio (15 goals) and junior Mike McKeefrey (10), a strong defensive corps and one of the nation's top goaltenders in Kasselakis.

"When you have a goaltender who can keep you in a game it is a great advantage," Cannella said. "It's com-

Men's hockey squares off against No. 4 BU tonight

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

After last Sunday's exciting 4–3 upset of then No. 3 New Hampshire, the only question that the Massachusetts hockey team faces is what will they do for an encore?

The Minutemen will once again get a test of their true mettle this weekend when No. 4 Boston University will square off against UMass in a home and home series (tonight, 7 p.m. at the Mullins Center, Saturday, 7 p.m. at Walter Brown Arena) this weekend.

UMass currently stands one point behind Merrimack for the final Hockey East playoff spot with four games to play in the regular season. But even though UMass pulled off the huge upset last weekend, the Minutemen aren't resting on their laurels one bit.

"It's going to be a battle Friday and Saturday night," Massachusetts senior goaltender Brian Regan said. "They're a very good team and we're coming off an emotional high, but if we don't go out there and put out the same effort that we did (against UNH), then we won't have a chance of beating them."

Regan was spectacular on Sunday against the Wildcats, recording 38 saves, and will be looked upon to lead the UMass charge once again.

Boston University is led by senior co–captain and 1996–97 Hobey Baker Award runner–up Chris Drury. The Trumbull, Conn. native leads the Terriers in scoring with 43 points, and recently netted his 100th career goal as a member of Jack Parker's squad.

Others who pack offensive punch for BU include senior Mike Sylvia (16 goals, 14 assists) and a large freshman class which has had a key role in the success of the Terriers.

Sophomore defenseman Tom Poti will lead an solid BU backline. The Worcester resident has 34 points in 1997–98, and was Hockey East co–player of the week with UMass' Tim Lovell back on Feb. 2. Senior co–captain Chris Kelleher and fellow classmate Jeff Kealty and junior Dan Ronan are also experienced on the blue line.

The Terriers also have the benefit of having not only dependable goaltender between the pipes, but two. Senior Tom Noble (11–4–1, 2.13 goals against average) and junior Michel Larocque (12–1–1, 1.97

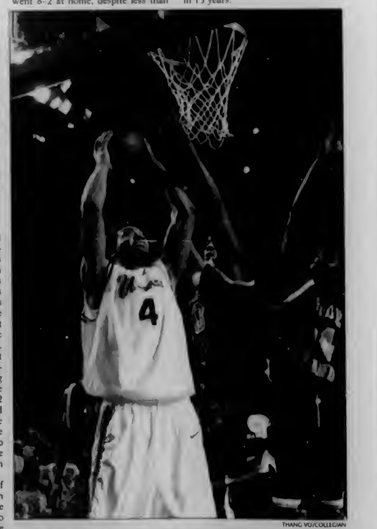
Minutemen face off with Owls in A–10 regular season title bout

By Luke Meredith
Collegian Staff

You really couldn't have scripted it any better.

After 15 games, the No. 20 Massachusetts men's basketball team and the Temple Owls, who have long been the two cornerstones of the Atlantic 10, sit together atop the conference at 12–3. The conference's premier rivalry for over a decade will see one of its biggest games on Sunday, when the Minutemen and the Owls settle the A–10 regular season title at 12:30 p.m. at the new Apollo of Temple. (ABC, WHMP). Sunday's game marks the regular season finale for the Minutemen, the first 20–win season in UMass coach Bruiser Flint's tenure.

Though UMass (20–8, 12–3) dropped its second game in three tries to St. Bonaventure 72–70 in double overtime on Wednesday night, they will still take home the A–10 regular season title with a win. After slipping to third in the A–10 East in 1997, a win will ensure a first round bye in the A–10 tournament, which kicks off March 4 at the CoreEstates Spectrum in Philadelphia.



Pepe Sanchez, who missed the first UMass game with a foot injury, will play on Sunday. UMass will once again look to conquer Temple's "match–up" zone, the toughest in a series the frontcourt–heavy Minutemen have seen this year.

The rivalry between UMass and Temple has its share of bad blood — such as Temple coach John Chaney's attack on former UMass coach John Calipari in the Mullins Center press room, or Lari Ketner's comments before the 61–47 loss at Mullins Center back on Feb. 3 saying Temple couldn't win without Sanchez — but there have also been some classic games, mostly in the favor of UMass. Before losing the last time out against the Owls, UMass had dominated Temple in recent years. During their Final Four season in 1996, the Minutemen held the Owls to 12 points in the first half at old McGonigle Hall, and beat Temple 59–35. Last season, UMass used the Temple game as a stepping stone to the NCAA tournament, burying the Owls 78–66 at their last game in McGonigle.

The Minutemen are coming off their first loss to St. Bonaventure in 21 tries. Despite trailing 35–24 at the half, UMass pushed the game to overtime, their third straight game that went to an extra frame. Lari Ketner's dunk with time running out in the first overtime kept the Minutemen alive before Bonnie star guard Tim Winn sank a three– pointer with less than 10 seconds remaining to give St. Bonaventure a 72–70 win. It was the first time in the 1997– 1998 season UMass had lost an A–10 road game.

Win or lose on Sunday, Massachusetts has had a surprisingly successful season — one many didn't expect from this edition of the UMass men's basketball team. After ending the non–conference opening slate 6–5, UMass ran off a 10–game win streak, a 9–0 start in the A–10 and wins over Xavier and Rhode Island on the road. The Minutemen went 8–2 at home, despite less than capacity crowds as some games. Their RPI ranking — a ranking based on strength of schedule and other factors crucial to snagging an at–large NCAA bid — has been in the Top 20 for much of the second half of the season, tops in the A–10. Barring a disaster, UMass should qualify for its eight straight NCAA tournament, and expect to earn a higher seed than last year's No. 11 seed in the East regional.

Temple has also had a successful season in wake of a string of tragedy that surrounded the basketball program in the off–season. The Owls are looking for their 14th NCAA invite in 15 years.

Serb police respond to Albanian militants

PRISTINA, Yugoslavia (AP) — Serbian police searched houses and seized weapons in Albanian villages in the province of Kosovo yesterday, ethnic Albanian officials said, a day after clashes killed at least 20 people.

Meanwhile, the leader of Kosovo's Albanians appealed to the United States and the European Union to pressure the government to stop what he called police violence.

"Urgent measures" are needed to prevent the Serb attacks against Kosovo's ethnic Albanian majority, Ibrahim Rugova said in a statement.

The latest fighting has heightened fear of all–out war in the province, which borders on Albania and is seeking autonomy from Serbia.

Saturday's clashes represented the worst single day of violence since the Kosovo Liberation Army began operating in 1996. The clandestine ethnic Albanian group has since claimed responsibility for several terrorist attacks.

World's first surviving septuplets reunited

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) — With their father grinning ear–to–ear and their mother crying, the world's first surviving septuplets were together at home yesterday after the last two babies were released from a hospital.

Natalie and Alexis McCaughey joined their brothers and sisters, who came home in January, in a small three–bedroom house in Carlisle where some 60 volunteers work shifts to care for the babies.

"It's great, finally, everybody under one roof," said the babies' father, Kenny McCaughey, carrying the bundled–up girls in separate car seats as the family left Blank Children's Hospital in Des Moines.

The four boys and three girls were born Nov. 19, about nine weeks early.

Normally, doctors hope that premature babies will be ready to go home around the date they would have been born if the pregnancy was carried to term.

However, Natalie and Alexis were held in the hospital longer because they didn't eat as aggressively as their brothers and sisters, said Wes Yoder, a spokesman for the family.

Casa Dominicana celebrates Independence Day in SUB

By Juan Carlos Kaplan
Collegian Staff

Saturday night marked the culmination of a three day celebration of the Dominican Republic's Independence. The event, organized by Casa Dominicana, a University of Massachusetts' Registered Student Organization, took place in the Student Union Ballroom and featured everything from poetry reading to traditional Dominican food to live entertainment.

With more than 200 people in attendance, Casa Dominicana hosted a party that was open to the whole UMass community as well as Latinos from Eastern Massachusetts and the New York/New Jersey area. For Amherst resident Brie Silva what made the night special was the upbeat atmosphere, "Everybody's happy, having a good time."

While there were many activities throughout the course of the evening such as the skit and dance performances by the group Cayena, the highlight was dancing to music provided by UMass DJs Concepto Latino and live entertainment courtesy of New York based Joseph Portes and his 14 member band of Dominicans and Puerto Ricans known as "El Gatito del Merengue y sus Gatitos" (The Cat of Merengue and his little Cats). The fast–paced Caribbean rhythms kept guests on the dance floor virtually non–stop as Portes' brass band mixed up original work with well known pieces in a combination of merengue, house and techno– merengue, salsa and even techno–vallenato.

Portes, a Dominican who resides in New Jersey, was very pleased with the turnout for the evening as well as Casa Dominicana's preparations.

"It was very well organized," Portes commented. "They've treated us excellently, very friendly."

Senior junior Ruiz, a civil engineering major, had equal praise for the organizers.

"This means a great deal," he said. "They [Casa Dominicana] have been working on this ever since I got to UMass four years ago."

Aside from the dancing, Saturday night's festivities were about community.

"We are all very united," Guarina Jaquez said. "Not just the Dominicans but all Hispanics."

"It's the Hispanic community together. They've come from all over; Lawrence, Springfield and New York," Ruiz added.

Not forgotten among the attendees was the reason for the festivities — the Feb. 27 celebration of the Dominican Republic's Independence Day. Frederic Matias, a Dominican from Lawrence said, "This [the celebration] signifies the freedom of our country." Mill Fernandez, also of Lawrence, added, "It's liberty — a light that illuminates our country."

Open Arms brings the community together with hugs and handshakes

By Ken Tatro
Collegian Staff

Happy faces filled the room at the Bangs Community Center in Amherst last Saturday as the third meeting of the Open Arms began with hugs and handshakes.

Open Arms, a collaboration between the University of Massachusetts, the Department of Mental Retardation and the residents of Amherst, hopes to assist in further integration of developmentally disabled individuals into the community.

According to Open Arms coordinator Ezzel Floranina this integration is accomplished through the pairing of community companions with developmentally disabled program participants and having them interact within the community.

Throughout the meeting approximately half of the 65 Open Arms participants interacted with each other. They discussed what they have done with their companions while others met for the first time.

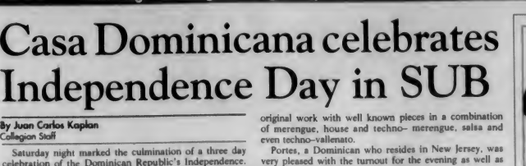
Many of the community companions expressed a great deal of satisfaction with the relationship they have developed with the program participants and partners.

"I like being in this program, it makes them [the developmentally disabled individuals] feel as though they are part of the community, it gets them involved," Davin Peele, a 17–year–old Amherst high school student, said.

Peele and his companion, Ben, assisted in a constructing a stage set for an upcoming Amherst high school play.

"It worked really well and exposed Ben to a lot of people," Peele said.

Thavma Phillips, a UMass senior, expressed similar sentiments after spending a day with her companion, Mike Muskus, of Amherst.



"It was really fun. We had a great time," Phillips said about the afternoon they spent at the Pratt museum.

The pair, who spend every Saturday afternoon together, have also gone to the St. Louis Symphony and the planetarium since they have been partners in Open Arms.

However, not all relationships run as smooth as those described by Phillips and Peele. According to Bill Apte, a 46–year–old Amherst resident, he and his companion have not had a chance to meet due to his work schedule and his companion's availability. Apte said this particular meeting was "no fun" because his companion was not present.

Floranina is concerned about the effects which departing community companions will have on the program. Open Arms is seeking more companions who can replace them.

Any member of the young adult community who is interested in becoming a community companion may contact Floranina at 256–4065.

Iraq will allow inspections

Agreement includes eight presidential palaces

By Robert H. Reid
Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — With the Security Council expected to threaten "very severe consequences," Iraq's U.N. ambassador said yesterday his government will honor an agreement to open suspected weapons sites to U.N. inspectors.

But Ambassador Nizar Hamdoon said the inspections should not be open–ended, even though no time limit is mentioned in the agreement, signed last week with U.N. Secretary–General Kofi Annan The 15–member council meets at 10:30 a.m. today to consider a U.S.–backed resolution submitted by Britain and Japan, endorsing the Annan agreement, which reduced the possibility of a military strike by the United States and Britain.

The final draft of the resolution warned of "very severe" consequences if Baghdad breaks the accord. Earlier drafts had used the phrase "severest consequences."

Earlier drafts also referred specifically to a 1991 council resolution, which branded Iraq's failure to abide by U.N. orders as a "material breach" of the truce which ended the Persian Gulf War.

But Russia, France, China and others objected to any language which might open the door to an automatic U.S. military response if Iraq violates the Annan deal.

In an effort to win unanimous support, the sponsors removed a direct resolution to the "material breach" resolution. Instead, the latest draft refers simply to "all relevant resolutions" on the issue.

Were the council to declare Iraq in "material breach" of the 1991 cease–fire, that would strengthen the U.S. case for launching military action under international law.

Although a vote was tentatively set for today, council diplomats said it was possible it could be pushed back until later in the week. The final draft was circulated late Friday so council ambassadors could refer the text to their home governments for approval.

In an interview yesterday with "CNN Late Edition," Iraq's Hamdoon, who participated in the negotiations with Annan in Baghdad, acknowledged that the agreement contains no time limit for inspections of eight presidential compounds which the Iraqis had placed off–limits.

"But I think that all the understanding was it should be within a reasonable time," Hamdoon said. "I mean, this process cannot continue forever."

Before Annan left for Baghdad last week, the United States insisted that any agreement should neither limit the duration of the inspections nor rule out the possibility of repeat visits as long as the U.N. inspectors felt they were necessary.

The inspectors are trying to determine whether Iraq has complied with orders issued at the end of the Persian Gulf War, to destroy all long–range missiles and mass destruction weapons.

That is the main condition for the council to lift crippling economic sanctions imposed on Iraq in 1990 after Saddam sent his forces into Kuwait, leading to the Gulf War.

Hamdoon said Iraq wants to see the inspectors complete their work and sanctions be lifted as soon as possible.

Gov. Gerhard Schroeder aims to end Helmut Kohl's reign

By Tony Czuczka
Associated Press

HANOVER, Germany — In a state vote with nationwide consequences, Lower Saxony Gov. Gerhard Schroeder won a sweeping re–election yesterday — and, in the process, a shot at ousting Chancellor Helmut Kohl after 16 years in power.

Confident in the governor's popularity, the Social Democratic party said it will nominate the telegenic Schroeder today as its candidate in September's race against the conservative Kohl, Europe's longest–serving leader.

"The Kohl era is over," Schroeder declared after partial returns gave his party more than 48 percent of the vote, compared to about 36 percent for Kohl's Christian Democratic Union. The 53–year–old Schroeder, who said he would accept the nomination, said yesterday's election "signals a deep–seeded wish for change in politics."

Already campaigning, the governor said he would fight to end unemployment, a key election issue in a country where joblessness is at a postwar high of more than 12 percent.

A fan of President Clinton and British leader Tony Blair, Schroeder presents a moderate–left challenge to years of conservative rule — much as with Clinton in 1992 and Blair last year. He wants to reach out to middle–class voters to avenge four straight Social Democratic defeats by Kohl.

For Europe, a victory by Schroeder in the chancellor's race would extend the continent's shift to the left, following Blair's Labor Party win and the election of socialist Prime Minister Lionel Jospin.

Christian Democrats were quick to dismiss the election's importance.

"A huge victory in one state has no meaning in the federal elections," Peter Hintze, the party leader, said in Bonn. Still, many Lower Saxons saw larger consequences in Sunday's vote, casting their ballot for Schroeder to send him into the chancellor's race even though that would take him away from the state.

"I voted for the SPD so he'll become a chancellor candidate," said student Jakob Krovoza, 22. "He stands for economic competence."

The Lower Saxony governor's recipe of saving jobs with state aid while promoting flexible working hours and deregulation has served him well. His northern state relies on jobs in heavy industry and at Volkswagen, Europe's biggest automaker.

But Schoeder's biggest appeal may be that he presents a new face to Germans ready for a change.

"We need some movement in German politics," said Rosemarie Bewersdorff, 68, after casting her vote in Hanover. "It's always that way when parties have been in power too long."

Polls indicate Schroeder has a far stronger chance to beat Kohl on Sept. 27 than the Social Democratic Party leader Oskar

Lafontaine — who suffered a bruising defeat to Kohl in the chancellor's race in 1990.

"Tomorrow, Gehrard Schroeder will become the Social Democrat's chancellor candidate," said party manager Franz Muntefering. Lafontaine, setting aside his own ambitions, is to recommend Schroeder personally.

In a clear attempt to keep Schroeder out of the chancellor's race, Kohl had campaigned heavily in Lower Saxony for Schroeder's rival, Christian Democratic Union candidate Christian Wulff. Becoming chancellor has long been Schroeder's dream. In the early 1990s, he was quoted as saying he wanted to open an annual trade expo in Hanover as chancellor in the year 2000.

Lore has it that as a young parliament member in the '80s, Schroeder stood outside the chancellery in Bonn after a late night of drinking and called out, "I want to be there!"

The governor's assets with voters include his rise from humble working–class origins, though nowadays he sports Cuban cigars and designer suits.

Study reports on shifts in US nuclear strategy

By John Diamond
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The United States should maintain the threat of nuclear retaliation with an "irrational and vindictive" streak to intimidate would-be attackers such as Iraq, according to an internal military study made public yesterday.

The study, "Essentials of Post-Cold War Deterrence," was written by the Defense Department's Strategic Command, a multiservice organization responsible for the nation's strategic nuclear arsenal. It was obtained under the Freedom of Information Act by an arms control group and published yesterday in a report on U.S. strategies for deterring attacks by antagonistic nations using chemical, biological or nuclear weapons.

"Because of the value that comes from the ambiguity of what the U.S. may do to an adversary if the acts we seek to deter are carried out, it hurts to portray ourselves as too fully rational and cool-headed," the 1995 Strategic Command study says.

The London-based think tank the British-American Security Information Council cited the STRATCOM document in its report as an example of the Pentagon's push to maintain a mission for its nuclear arsenal long after the Soviet threat disappeared.

The report portrays the command as fighting and winning an internal bureaucratic battle against liberal Clinton administration officials who lean in favor of dramatic nuclear weapons reductions. Citing a range of formerly classified documents obtained through the Freedom of Information Act, the report shows how the United States shifted its nuclear deterrent strategy from the defunct Soviet Union to so-called rogue states: Iraq, Libya, Cuba, North Korea and the like.

In its study, the Strategic Command uses Cold War language in defending the relevance of nuclear weapons in deterring such potential adversaries.

"The fact that some elements [of the U.S. government] may appear to be potentially 'out of control' can be beneficial to creating and reinforcing fears and doubts within the minds of an adversary's decision makers," its report said. "That the U.S. may become irrational and vindictive if its vital interests are attacked should be a part of the national persona we project to all adversaries."

The idea of projecting an aura of irrationality was not original to STRATCOM. It dates at least as far back as the early 1960s, when Harvard Professor Thomas Schelling was writing his ground-breaking works on game theory and nuclear bargaining.

"It is not a universal advantage in situations of conflict to be inalienably and manifestly rational in decision and motivation," Schelling wrote. These were ideas later adopted by Henry Kissinger and President Nixon in using coercive air strikes on North Vietnam as a way of forcing Hanoi to the bargaining table in the latter stages of the Vietnam War.

In 1997, two years after STRATCOM advanced its latter-day version of this theory, President Clinton approved a directive on U.S. nuclear policy that upheld the "negative security assurance" that the United States will refrain from first-use of nuclear weapons against signatories to the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, a list that includes Iraq, Iran, Libya and North Korea. The policy, however, includes exceptions that presidential adviser Robert Bell said have been "refined" in recent years. They would allow responding with nuclear weapons to attacks by nuclear-capable states, countries that are not in good standing under the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty or states allied with nuclear powers. Iraq, which the United States regards as violating international atomic weapons restrictions, could be one such exception.

Arms control advocates are concerned that signatories to the Non-Proliferation Treaty who possess no nuclear weapons will abandon the pact if they see the existing nuclear powers preserving their nuclear arsenals and finding missions for their weapons — particularly if those missions include scenarios that involve attacks on them.

Bell, President Clinton's senior adviser on nuclear weapons and arms control matters, disputed that argument in an interview Friday.

"I don't think there's a disconnect in principle between some level of general planning at STRATCOM and the negative security assurance and our goals relative to the Non-Proliferation Treaty," Bell said. Treaty signatories are more worried about their neighbors than the United States. Bell said, and they support the nuclear weapons reductions the treaty imposes on nuclear-armed states.

Of the 1995 Strategic Command document, Bell said, "That sounds like an internal STRATCOM paper which certainly does not rise to the level of national policy."

Embezzlement sends Spain's police chief to jail

By Johanna Tuckman
Associated Press

MADRID, Spain — Spaniards are reveling in the spectacle of a national police chief and a debonair banker being whisked off to spend years in prison, a scene many consider a fitting end to embezzlement scandals that brought down both men and shook up a government.

The police chief is Luis Roldan, who headed Spain's paramilitary Civil Guard between 1986 and 1993. The banker is Mario Conde, who personified financial and social success during the same era. They came to symbolize a cynical arrogance within the political and financial elite that emerged during Spain's transition to democracy after the 1975 death of dictator Gen. Francisco Franco. A Madrid court sentenced Roldan to 28 years on Thursday for abusing his position as head of the Civil Guard to amass a $14 million personal fortune. Just hours later, the Supreme Court of Justice sentenced Mario Conde to 4 1/2 years in a separate scandal, for defrauding the Banco Espanol de Credito, known as Banesto, of more than $4 million.

Spaniards who resented the traditional impunity of the rich and powerful were delighted at their downfall, and editorial cartoonists and writers applauded "justice being done" and "democracy being reaffirmed."

"When I was studying business, I wanted to be just like you, and look! Now we'll be made it together," the police chief says to the banker during a jailhouse handshake in a cartoon in the Barcelona daily La Vanguardia.

The Roldan affair was one of the scandals that contributed to Socialist Prime Minister Felipe Gonzalez' electoral defeat in 1996 after 13 years in office.

Close to the Socialists, Roldan was tapped as a future interior minister at the time he resigned from the Civil Guard in 1993, just before the first newspaper exposes of his hidden Swiss bank accounts.

"Just remember the still powerful Luis Roldan dressed in a camel hair coat denying everything that had been published" an editorial in Spain's biggest-selling daily El Pais mused Friday. Spaniards also recall how Roldan's personal fraud was uncovered — he forged academic titles on his way to the top — as well as his flight from Spain in 1994 only to be nabbed in Laos 10 months later.

As a fugitive, Roldan further damaged Gonzalez by saying the then-prime minister was fully aware of the dirty war waged from within his government against the armed Basque separatist group ETA, initials signifying Basque Homeland and Liberty. The counterinsurgency campaign left 27 people dead.

Conde, a financier with slicked-back hair who once hobnobbed with King Juan Carlos, came to represent dirt on the other side of the political coin. He repeatedly has been linked to conspiracies to bring down Gonzalez as a stepping stone toward realization of his own presidential ambitions. He claims to be the victim of a Socialist-led smear campaign.

Earlier in February, Conde again was rumored to be the architect of a recently revealed conspiracy to bring down Gonzalez.

Government seizes Sweeney house, land

By Leslie Miller
Associated Press

HAMILTON, Mass. — Movers hired by the government carted off the Sweeney family's possessions yesterday, a day after federal marshals ended a nine-month stand-off over a loan dispute by arresting John Sweeney and seizing the family's estate.

The family denied the federal government had a right to take their 14-acre property — including a house and outbuildings that belonged to Sweeney's great-grandfather, a Cabinet official and U.S. ambassador.

"I just think they're out of control," said Sweeney's daughter Sabrina in a phone interview from suburban Atlanta.

Among the items seized were family portraits, antique furniture, children's artwork and photographs with sentimental value, Sabrina Sweeney said.

The Sweeneys' belongings were to be put into storage and the keys to the property turned over to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp.

The takeover of the estate culminated a 10-year dispute in which an uppercrust family that had owned its property for six generations became victims of an '80s-style bank failure — and then heroes of a '90s-style militia movement.

"One of the things people in Hamilton are wondering is how did the transformation occur?" said Sen. Bruce Tarr, a Gloucester Republican who had met with the Sweeneys weekly since last fall. It began in 1987 when John Sweeney and his wife, Rhetta, borrowed $1.6 million from the now-defunct ComFed Savings Bank of Lowell in order to subdivide their land. When the Sweeneys defaulted, ComFed began to foreclose.

The Sweeneys convinced a state court that ComFed had swindled them, and in 1991 ComFed was ordered to pay them $3.9 million. A federal court overruled the state court, though, and the Resolution Trust Company bought the Sweeney property at foreclosure in 1994.

"The problem always was that the Sweeneys were looking for criminal redress and the FDIC was looking to resolve a debt, and they were on different wavelengths," Tarr said.

Last June, federal marshals were ordered to evict John and Rhetta Sweeney. Instead, the couple barricaded themselves inside their home and sent a plea for help over the Internet.

Weld to the rescue

A poll in the Feb. 25 Boston Globe reported that the front runner for the Republican primary in New Hampshire is none other than George Bush.

I know, I know — you thought George Bush left office in 1992 and forever disappeared from the political scene. However, this report does not refer to the George Herbert Walker Bush whom we all know and love, but rather to his son George W. Bush Jr., the current governor of Texas.

With Clinton's self-appointed predecessor Al Gore poised to take over the party reigns, the Democrats appear ready to run another juggernaut campaign in the year 2000. Meanwhile, the Republicans continue to search for a candidate...any candidate...heck, they'll settle for anyone the public will bother to look at twice.

I hate to crush Republican hopes, but I do not think that Bush, a relative newcomer to the national political scene, is that someone. I realize the presidential election is still two years away, but the question remains: Do the Republicans have any candidates? Who should they run? I answer with a question of my own: Where's William Weld?

> "The harsh reality remains that to win elections, or even pass legislation, one has to be more moderate."
> Adam T. Martignetti

The 1996 presidential election was nothing less than disastrous for the Republicans. After a historic and sweeping victory of Congress in 1994, the Republicans found themselves without a single decent candidate for the presidency. Let's face it, even if you eliminated Bill Clinton — good economy, sexual allegations and all — I still don't think Dole had a chance.

My own informal survey of students here on campus points to one single reason why they didn't vote for Dole: "He's just old." When people are more concerned with your candidate's age than his policies, you have obviously failed miserably in selecting that candidate.

As the next presidential election creeps closer, a similar cast of Republicans has assembled to vie for the right to be defeated by Al Gore. I ask again, whom can the Republicans run?

Steve Forbes? With no real political experience, it is extremely unlikely that anyone would vote for this rich multi-millionaire tycoon. At one point Ross Perot, a similar big money candidate, did garner about 24 percent of the American vote as an Independent. But he had great innovative issues, such as reducing national debt. Steve Forbes has nothing

Lamar Alexander? A "candidate" for the last Republican nomination, this former governor of Tennessee has done nothing noteworthy enough to propel him to a presidential victory. I don't think that being governor of a backward state like Tennessee qualifies anyone to be president. That would be almost as bad as electing a president from Arkansas.

The Republicans are not stupid enough to consider running Newt Gingrich, are they? I realize that this may sound odd, but all of the above candidates may be a bit too far to the right to have any chance of winning the popular vote.

In the unforgiving modern political world, the trend is to move toward the center, to be moderate. Just ask Bill Clinton — better yet, ask Democrats about Bill Clinton. Most liberal Democrats agree Bill Clinton has become far too moderate, either by choice or by force of a Republican Congress. To them, Clinton is an enormous disappointment.

The harsh reality remains that to win elections, or even pass legislation, one has to be more moderate. In political jargon, it is called "crossing political lines." The Republicans have such a candidate if they would wake up, open their eyes and look.

After being denied ambassadorship to Mexico, the self-proclaimed "social, liberal and fiscal conservative" William Weld sits at home, probably enjoying life. Sure, top Republican leaders like Jesse "Bring Back the 19th Century" Helms don't like Bill Weld, but frankly the public doesn't care who or what Jesse Helms likes or dislikes.

Unfortunately for Republicans, the former Massachusetts governor probably holds the Republican's best chance of winning the presidency. Why? First, Weld, a Republican, accomplished one of the most miraculous feats in recent political history. He was elected governor of Massachusetts, the most Democratic state in the union. Not once, but twice.

As governor, he lowered taxes, implemented tough crime programs and brought sweeping social reform. In fact, the people of Massachusetts appreciated Weld's work so much that his loss to John Kerry for a Senate seat was perceived as the people's approval of his phenomenal job as governor and their desire to keep him in that office.

In addition, Weld has already proven that he can procure the cross-party support needed to win the popular vote. In the aforementioned Jesse Helms fiasco, Weld received support from Bill Clinton as well as other notable Democrats, besides some Republicans who normally oppose him. Weld has also been mentioned as a possible successor to Janet Reno should the Republicans try to impeach her.

So what if he's more liberal than some Republicans would like? He can win...I don't even know if William Weld has aspirations to run for the presidency, but I do know this: In the mire and muck of old faces and wannabees, Weld gives the Republicans a smart, fresh and innovative candidate to run.

So while Jesse Helms is sitting at home planning his next Congressional conquest, he should pick up the phone and give Mr. Weld a call. It just might pay off in 2000.

Letters to the Editor

Ski bum bravado

In reference to "Confessions of a Ski Bum" (Feb. 26): Chris [Stamm], let me tell you that you weren't confessing to be a ski bum, you were confessing to be a poser.

First off how could anyone on the East Coast be a ski bum? There aren't any mountains here, just icy covered slopes (I think they are referred to as foothills in the West).

Next off, you really looked bad when you told the public that you didn't even ski (or luge) down the hill last year. That alone would get your membership cut off at any local ski tavern.

A New Year's resolution for a bona fide ski bum is not promising to make it down a few runs once this year. I have heard legit comments like: "I'm going to have my pass totally covered by New Year's Eve" out of just weekend skiers. Possible resolution for next year: Ski seven days in a row without crying about it.

Another tip for living out your childhood dream: Don't think making an expensive trip to some fancy-dancy ski lodge makes you a "ski bum." Might I suggest Utah, Montana, Norther Colorado or even Wyoming? Visit a small town in one of those Rocky Mountain states and take notes from some of the thousands of transplants who really wanted to be a ski bum. There are plenty of jobs available at every mountain (notice how I moved on from hill).

I'll bet Chris is one of the hundreds of students walking around in a $350 powder jacket and considers knee-high snow powder. You don't know what powder is until you need to take a snorkel while skiing.

Oh and by the way... the "shaped" ski is a marketing ploy. To teach wannabee skiers how to turn better.

Consider adoption an option

The article about single parents raising their children while in school brought up an issue that has been given a lot of attention in the media lately. Teens, especially girls that are 15 or 16 years old, raising their children are being glorified.

Why is it that the only alternatives people think of when faced with a pregnancy are abortion or raising the child? I was adopted when I was born. My biological parents were young at the time, and knew that we might all have better opportunities in our lives if I was given to loving parents who desperately wanted children of their own, and were more prepared to handle parenthood.

I'm sure that they considered taking me home from the hospital, this little living doll that they had given birth to, and were maybe a little attached to. But they knew that as teens they still had so much growing up to do themselves they couldn't provide all of the things, especially the stability, that my real parents could. So they made a very hard, unselfish choice and it is something that my family and I have always been grateful for.

I'm not trying to say that young people can't be good parents. I'm sure that they love their children very much, and try to give them what is best. But the news covers stories about how all of these teenagers are so self-sacrificing, to give up their own childhood to work hard and care for their babies.

Well, who got pregnant in the first place? Yes, accidents can happen, I can attest to that. But I really wish that once there would be a story about how hard it was for the parents who made the difficult decision to put their child up for adoption, knowing it was the best option.

My biological parents and my sisters, brought a family to loving, wonderful people who might not have had that chance otherwise. The waiting list now in some places is years long to get a child from an adoption agency, and so many people will not get the chance that my parents did.

Sometimes it's hard to do what is best for that child, but if the biological parents really love that baby, they will want him or her to have the best out of life. And that child will thank them for it.

Wyclef Jean hits Smith

Hip–hop artist gives multi–faceted live performance

Wyclef Jean entertains Smith College with loose improvisations

WYCLEF JEAN & THE REFUGEE ALL–STARS / DAS EFX
John M. Greene Hall
Feb. 27

NORTHAMPTON — Ever since The Sugarhill Gang inaugurated the history of recorded hip–hop with their 1979 single "Rapper's Delight," the can't–cut–it–live stigma has been hung like an unwelcome banner over the crest of nearly every MC's fashionable duds. Call it the curse of live rap.

Following in the footsteps of Stetsasonic's "hip–hop band" philosophy of the mid–90s, newcomers like the Roots and the Fugees each overcame the in–concert pitfalls that befell many of their contemporaries by utilizing strictly live instrumentation with bass, drums and guitars replacing canned beats.

During Lauryn Hill's hiatus from performing and recording while she had a baby, Fugees leader Wyclef Jean delivered a quasi–solo album featuring guest appearances from fellow Fugees Hill and Prakazrel Michel (Pras), as well as dozens of others. Released last summer, The Carnival is an open, yet funky college of hip–hop, soul, blues, jazz and reggae that rises above the standard fare of gangsta clichés that plagues so much of today's hip–hop.

Although acknowledging Puff Daddy's influence in the hip–hop community by having his DJ, Leon, spin bits of Biggie's "Hypnotize" and "Mo' Money, Mo' Problems," Jean's method of weaving in bits of older tunes — on record at least — should never be compared to the outright thievery of Puffy.

The two are actually quite dissimilar because Clef isn't into the hero–worship of Puff Daddy. Instead, he turns fluff material like the Bee Gees "Stayin' Alive" into a witty commentary on urban life on "We Trying To Stay Alive."

Through a seemingly endless display of guitar jams, loose grooves and laidback improvisation at Smith College Friday night, Jean and the All–Stars (featuring Pras, John Forte and Cannabis) demonstratively and vividly illustrated everything rap/hip–hop can be in a live setting. That is, before he turned the proceedings

Jean sits down to share thoughts

By Marty Keane
Collegian Staff

Chowing down an order of buffalo chicken wings and winding down after a marathon two hour show in the dank, musty basement of John M. Greene Hall early Saturday morning, Wyclef Jean sat down to discuss his views on Ol' Dirty Bastard, his "responsibilities," personal philosophies on what he does, as well as give an update on things in Fugees camp.

As he was presenting the award for Song of the Year on Wednesday night's Grammy telecast, Ol' Dirty Bastard of the Wu-Tang Clan grabbed a microphone complaining that Wu-Tang didn't win (even though they weren't even nominated in the category). "It's funny because I had just recorded a song for him a week before... and he really did spend a lot of money on that suit," Jean said. "I guess he was disappointed."

According to Jean, "playing colleges are the most fun" and he feels that he has a "definite responsibility" to fans, especially since hip–hop "is what most college kids listen to these days."

On his live performance style, Jean's goal is to make shows "festive." He said that "I try to give them (the fans) the best show I can... I try to give them something to talk about and make them happy for a few weeks."

He chided the "violent stereotypes" that plague hip–hop currently and said that he always strives to "go against those stereotypes" and "be entertaining."

On the Fugees front, Jean said the highly–anticipated follow–up to The Score is still a little ways off (most likely early next year), but he added that they're getting "in the zone" and that the new album will reflect the changing face of hip–hop.

In the meantime however, the next several months will see the three Fugees members staying busy with their own projects. Jean said he collaborated on one track on Lauryn Hill's debut solo album, which is due out this spring. He said to look for a solo effort from Pras to follow sometime in mid–summer.

Marisol captures Rivera's poetic vision

MARISOL
Rand Theater
Feb. 26–28

"Marisol began on a cold October night, about two in the morning, in 1980, when I was returning to my Bronx apartment after a visit to my sister in Ohio. I had arrived around midnight at New York's Port Authority and was taking the IRT subway home. I was reading the Sunday New York Times and was the only person in the subway car when a man approached wielding a golf club. His clothes were black with filth and he didn't have any shoes...He lunged at me with his golf club, just missing my head. I had nothing to defend myself with but the newspaper. He tried one more time to strike me. I got up to fight. He staggered backward as the unsteady subway car lurched to a stop at 180th Street. I ran out as fast as I could... Marisol began six months later. I had left the Bronx and was living with an artist in Brooklyn. It was late at night. The phone rang. It was my friend Brooke calling. He said that he had just heard news reports about the death of a young man named Jose Rivera who lived in Brooklyn. He was wondering if it was me..." And so the concept of Marisol was born out of the bizarre playwright's José Rivera's life.

Rivera's magical and apocalyptic play, Marisol, directed by Linda McInerney, opened at the University of Massachusetts's Rand Theater last Thursday, through the collaborative efforts of the Department of Theater and New WORLD Theater. The surreal storyline traces a timid Latina woman through a journey of soul, imagination and hope in a very real representation of the violence and decomposition of society that people are forced to cope with everyday.

The young woman, Marisol, played by Alexida Sanabria, is confronted by an angel in her sleep. Sanabria's character is a paranoid figure, a pretty young woman who is scared of everything in her world. As the play develops, Sanabria breathes life into this timid creature, and we see Marisol as a woman who is not going to resign herself to the role of victim anymore. Her guardian angel, played by Bonita Oliver, is unlike any stereotypical Cherubim you could imagine: she is a tall, bald African–American woman, dressed from head to toe in leather. Her very presence is enough to make one tremble.

Although her appearance is intimidating, her manner is loving and she has descended in order to tell Marisol that she will not be able to watch over her any longer, as she had been doing for many years. Marisol bombards her with passionate questions about the miserable state of life on earth, even asking "Where is the moon? Nobody's seen it in almost nine months!"

"The universal body is sick," the angel answers. "The infected earth is running a temperature... because God is dying." In order for peace to be restored on earth, anarchy must govern and chaos temporarily ensue in a kind of "celestial Vietnam" which pits the angels against the sick and senile God. And Marisol's own guardian angel is going to lead the forces into battle.

Although we never see the actual crusade, we see the horrific effects of it through the interactions between and the situations of the characters. Marisol, in her journey to find strength in the tumultuous world, encounters some pretty outrageous people, including a feisty co–worker played by Tary Chevalier, her lunatic brother and a self to the role of victim anymore. "Guiding Light" clones for ratings

Hi soap fans, this week has certainly had its fair share of unexpected developments, starting with one of daytime's best kept secrets, "Guiding Light." The soap 'fessed up the details concerning one of its upcoming plots, lauded as being the most outrageous and over the top storyline in the show's long and tulmutuous history. Here's the scoop that has Lighthead's ("GL" fan club) everywhere in a huff with some even threatening to boycott the show altogether. Josh, out of his mind with grief over the "death" of his wife, resorts to drastic measures and has Reva cloned (try to keep the laughs to a minimum. As if the alien encounter on "General Hospital" and Marlena's possession on "Days of Our Lives" wasn't humiliating enough to the industry, now we're being treated to this farce.

Jacob Fanning

Apparently, Josh is going to enlist the help of one of Springfield's most prominent M.D.'s in his quest to clone the diva herself (as if one isn't enough). From what I understand, the clone will undergo a series of rapid maturation. First they'll show her as a fetus, then as a late teen two weeks later and so on until she's in full bloom (ugh, I'm getting a migraine). What the hell is this ridiculousness? I feel like I'm trapped in an episode of the "X-Files" or something.

Meanwhile, back in Springfield, Josh continues to tell everyone that Reva has flown the coop for some much needed rest and relaxation and that she'll be home soon.

What Josh doesn't realize, however, is that Reva is indeed alive and kicking on some deserted island (with the exception of a studly stowaway, of course). How will it all work out? You'll just have to tune in and find out for yourselves or at least that's what "GL" is hoping that you'll do.

Why they're doing this is obvious: ratings, ratings and more ratings. The show is most likely hoping to cash in on "Days" earlier success with the possession storyline (in which the show shot up in the Neilsen's from number five or six to number two). The show's quality and reputation may have taken a hit but the all important ratings certainly didn't. "GL" probably feels that without Cynthia Watros (Annie), whose one woman tour de force was largely responsible for the show's recent rating's boost, the clock is ticking and the spotlight is fading. They need something big to fill the void and as much as I hate to admit it, the buzz on this storyline just might do it for them. The fact of the matter is, gimmicks such as these often work (à la "Sunset Beach's" Terror Island saga) but at what cost?

At least two of my friends (one of which has been a "GL" fan for over 10 years) have said to me that they'll be swapping soaps if "GL" goes through with this and they aren't alone. The online site has been buzzing with disgruntled and even disgusted die-hard fans who are pleading with the soap to scrap the storyline before it becomes a three ring circus. Sure, the show might draw in a few new viewers but is it worth losing the ones that have seen the show through some of its darkest hours (including rumors of cancellation), fans who have been loyal to the show for years.

The idea, in my opinion, is a lousy one. What makes daytime so unique as a medium is its panache for romance and its focus on character development, interaction, etc, not this science fiction, action adventure crap. It all comes out looking so campy and cheesey (certainly doesn't help it's credibility) but then again, if done right, it could turn out to be quite a coup (like the Terror Island saga on "SB"). It's doubtful but within the realm of possibility. Either way, don't give up on "Light" just yet.

Well, in case you missed it (gasp), the Soap Opera Digest award show aired last Friday and, overall, I'm quite happy with the outcome. The show itself was a hoot, definitely the most fun I've had in weeks (sadly enough). You should have seen the sis or seven of us applauding and screaming. It was quite a sight (always an event with us). The night's big winner was "GH" with a whopping six out of six wins including its win for outstanding drama.

There really weren't any shockers with the exception of Eileen Davidson (Kristin, Susan, "Days") and Cynthia Watros (Annie, "GL") losses for Outstanding Lead Female and Best Vixen respectively. The highlight of the night (there were so many) had to have been the presentation of the award for Hottest Male don't you just love soaps absolutely no shame) by none other than Susan Banks on "Days" (Eileen Davidson in garb). Hearing her belt out,_"Ladies , you better get out your umbrellas cause it's raining men!" through those pearly whites of hers was too much. As for our picks, we weren't that far off the mark. We guessed 12 out of the 16. Here's a list of the winners.

Outstanding Lead Actor: John Callahan (Edmund, "All My Children")

Outstanding Lead Actress: Vanessa Marcil (Brenda, "GH") loved her acceptance speech in which she thanked Tyler, of course, and the "GH" head hanchos for standing by her, "even when she sucked."

Hottest Male: Ingo Rademacher (Jax, "GH")

Hottest Female: Sharon Case (Sharon, "Young and the Restless")

Hottest Romance: Mateo and Hayley from "AMC"

Supporting Actor: Michael E. Knight (Tad, "AMC")

Supporting Actress: Judi Evans (Paulina, "Another World")

Younger Lead Actor: Steve Burton (Jason, "GH")

Younger Lead Actress: Sarah Brown (Carly, "GH")

Villian: Roger Howarth (Todd, "One Live To Live")

Villianess (vixen): Alison Sweeney (Sami, "Days")

Male Newcomer: Jensen Ackles (Eric, "Days")

Female Newcomer: Sabryn Genet (Tricia, "Y&R")

Male Scene Stealer: John Ingle (Edward, "GH")

Female Scene Stealer: Jennifer Bassey (Marian, "AMC")

New Character: Cassie, "Guiding Light"

Outstanding Drama: "General Hospital"

Quote of the Week: Carly to Brenda during their little tiff (one of the best verbal catfights in years): "I'm sure if you look [in the mall], you'll find a fashionable straight jacket that's your size!" Meow!

A few quick Sink or Swim's this week:

Sink: Keesha on "GH." She's such a sanctimonious witch. My friend: Dave, and I are writing a piece entitled, "101 Ways To Kill Keesha." We plan on sending Bob Guza a copy as soon as possible.

Swim: To Leslie Anne Down (Olivia, "SB") on her incredible and utterly tragic portrayal of a grief stricken mother (she was told that her newborn son died during delivery). She's been an absolute gem during these past few months.

Courtney Love fights documentary release

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — Courtney Love quashed it at Sundance. Now Kurt Cobain's widow is warning a movie theater against screening a documentary suggesting Cobain's death was no suicide.

Kurt and Courtney, by British filmmaker Nick Broomfield, opened Friday at the Roxie Cinema, the same day the theater got a letter from Love's lawyer warning that the theater would share any liability with the filmmaker and those in it who raise questions about Love's role in Cobain's death, such as her father Hank Harrison.

"We are told that Mr. Broomfield's movie conveys the message that Ms. Love killed her husband Kurt Cobain or somehow participated in his murder. Such accusations are false and defamatory, nothing more," the letter from attorney Michael Chodos said.

Cobain, lead singer of the band Nirvana, was found dead in his Seattle home in 1994 of an apparently self-inflicted gunshot to the head. He was on heroin at the time and although his death was ruled a suicide, questions and conspiracy theories continued to swirl on the Internet.

Love's estranged father, along with many of the couple's former friends, say in the film that they believe Ms. Love may have been involved in Cobain's death.

"I love my daughter very, very much," Harrison said at a screening Friday. "I also have very, very dark suspicions about what went on (with Kurt's death) because of my real experience with Courtney."

In one scene, Broomfield visits a musician who claims Love offered him $50,000 to "whack" Cobain.

Love succeeded in getting the film withdrawn from the Sundance Film Festival in January, claiming it featured unauthorized music.

Broomfield, who said all licensing was in order, accused festival organizers of cowardice.

Roxie Cinema owner Bill Banning laughed off the legal threat.

"So far, so good. We haven't had any bailiffs show up or anything like that," he said Friday after the first few screenings. "It's really a First Amendment issue."

into an ill-advised hour-long excursion featuring tedious displays of audience members' rapping prowess and flaccid DJ-ing skills. Seriously, who in the crowd paid $20 to hear Puff Daddy pumped through the speakers? Don't we get enough of him already?

While the show never quite achieved the level of reckless, rampaging momentum that he's possible of producing live, Jean came close several times. "Guantanamera," "Gone Till November" and the opening cover of "No Woman, No Cry" were wistful sing-a-longs while "Fugee-La" and "Anything Can Happen" both quickened the show's uneven pace.

Jean managed to throw the audience a few curveballs too, performing all-too-brief snippets of A Tribe Called Quest's "Scenario" and the Fugees "Nappy Heads" — a tune off their 1994 debut.

Early arrivals were treated to an unannounced set by East Coast outfit Das EFX. Led by Brooklyn's DJ Dice, Drayz and Skoob Effect warmed up an anxious crowd with a 50-minute set that featured the usual hip-hop sloganeering and audience-baiting, but with a positive message.

When the duo concentrated on rapping instead of extolling the virtues of marijuana smoking and pondering Bill Clinton's sex life, their music succeeded, if only on a superficial level. Both their 1992 breakthrough hit "They Want EFX" and "Straight From the Sewer" provided brief but entertaining respites from their sophomoric antics.

Winfrey reflects on time in Amarillo

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Madonna doesn't want her baby daughter to be an only child.

"I would love to have a brother or sister for Lola," Madonna said. "I don't know when, but it'll happen."

Lola is Madonna's nickname for her 16-month-old daughter, Lourdes Maria, who the 39-year-old superstar says has made her life "infinitely richer."

"I feel like I'm starting my life all over in some ways," Madonna said. "My daughter's birth was like a rebirth for me."

The Material Girl has a new album out, Ray of Light, but wants to limit touring so she can spend as much time with Lourdes as possible, saying motherhood brought emotional growth for the entertainer often criticized for being childish.

"I got to a point where I went, 'OK, I've been incredibly petulant, incredibly self-indulgent, incredibly naive,'" she said. "But I needed to do all of those things to get where I am now, and where I am now I'm very happy with."

James Brolin and Barbra Streisand's wedding date is still up in the air.

"We're trying to find the right place, so the press won't be around," Streisand says in the March 9 People magazine.

The press got in the way early last month in New York when Brolin got in a scuffle with a newspaper photographer outside a Manhattan theater. The shutterbug and the star of the TV series "Pensacola: Wings of Gold" both filed harassment complaints.

"The guy was blocking my path," says Brolin, 57. "There was no deliberate contact. My only thought when we're out in public is making sure Barbra is protected."

Streisand, 55, looks forward to being a bride.

"I've never had a big wedding," Streisand said. "So sometimes I think about designing a beautiful wedding dress and the fantasy of a bouquet."

Frank Sinatra's daughters hate the upcoming HBO movie The Rat Pack. Starring Ray Liotta as Sinatra, Joe Mantegna as Dean Martin and Don Cheadle as Sammy Davis Jr., the film doesn't do the legendary entertainers justice, according to Sinatra kin who have appealed to Ted Turner, vice chairman of Time Warner Inc.

"It's a blatant raping of not only what my dad did, but of all those other brilliant performers," Tina Sinatra says in the March 7 TV Guide. "There's no regard for the truth. It turns them all into caricatures of themselves."

The show, scheduled for late this year or early 1999, will apparently go on. But the family is refusing to allow the use of Sinatra's recordings.

Six weeks in Texas defending herself against a cattlemen's lawsuit while still doing her daily show opened Oprah Winfrey's eyes.

In a town where some wore buttons featuring Oprah's face with a red slash across it, others invited her home for dinner.

"I am grateful for the kindness of strangers. I'll miss Amarillo. I'll miss the sunsets and the sunrises," said Winfrey, who won the product defamation lawsuit that arose from an "Oprah" show on mad cow disease.

Before coming to town, Winfrey sent a security team to make sure she would be safe from a lunatic's bullet and her dogs would be safe from poisoning, the Amarillo Globe-News reported yesterday. Instead, she found fans everywhere, cheering her as she came to and from her daily appearances in court and clamoring for tickets to her shows taped in Amarillo.

"I live in a building in Chicago where I don't even know my neighbors," she said. "I've never had this sense of community and extension of spirit the way I've felt it here."

comic representations of society's worst pariahs. He was often scurrying about, clambering up and down stairs, and even scaling walls. His antics allowed moments of great humor to permeate a show in which otherwise fairly somber issues are paramount. However the the chemistry and diversity of the entire cast was successful in creating a cohesive bunch of characters within which Marisol could search for her own identity.

The set for Marisol, designed by Scott Dahl, with lightening by Lara Bohon and sound by Emily Stork, was the show's most impressive aspect. The set comprised of a moveable stage and diaphanous metallic structure. In accordance with the play's Armageddon-like theme, dark colors, smoke and beams of bright light were implemented to create an eerie urban effect. Much like the text, the set complete with lighting and sound, portrays an accurate intimate urban feel through very dream-like and surreal means.

In a talk-back after Friday night's performance, Rivera answered audience questions and talked about his experience in writing Marisol. Much of the play derives from his own life and the audience members were most interested in Rivera's artistic choices, his beliefs and his life. When asked why he had chosen to have an African-American angel, Rivera answered, "Every Renaissance angel is a white European angel... I thought that was absurd. If there is an afterlife and there are angels, then they're for everybody." Another audience member asked the playwright if he believed in apocalyptic changes. He replied, "As a poet I do, because of the metaphoric power."

The poetic side of Rivera come out not only in text but seems also have carried over into the directing of Marisol. The play had a very poetic fluid feel throughout. Some of Rivera's success in play writing may be attributed to dreamy poetic style.

Marisol will continue to run March 3–7 in the Rand Theater at 8 p.m. There will also be a 2 p.m. matinee on Saturday, March 7. For more information or for tickets, call the box office at 545–2511 or (800) 999–UMAS.

Vienna Philharmonic still all-male

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press Writer

NEW YORK — There were far fewer protesters in front of Carnegie Hall this year.

However, when the Vienna Philharmonic walked on stage, it was still an all-male ensemble, an anachronism in the music world. Yes, the orchestra did vote to break its gender barrier on Feb. 27, 1997 — just before last year's U.S. tour — ending a tradition that began with the group's birth in 1842.

But harpist Anna Lelkes, the woman admitted last year, wasn't required in Friday and yesterday's programs, and it was the turn of the other harpist, Harold Kautzky, to play in Mahler's Symphony No. 4 on Saturday night.

Of the five positions that opened in the past year — tuba, trumpet, principal viola, second violin, principal cello — women auditioned for only the final two. And of the five women who did audition, none was selected.

It remains unclear whether last year's vote marked the start of a determined effort to integrate.

The roughly half-dozen protesters who chanted slogans and passed out leaflets before Friday's concert apparently weren't convinced. But they were far fewer than the two dozen demonstrators outside Carnegie Hall at each of the orchestra's performances last year. What's clear now is that the Vienna Philharmonic retains its singular sound — deep, lush strings producing chords that seem to flow off the stage into the auditorium, a burnished molasses of notes no other orchestra in the world can match. It's hard to believe this same orchestra was booed last month for poor playing during a concert in Madrid, Spain, under conductor Lorin Maazel. Riccardo Muti, the conductor of this year's U.S. tour, did not impose any idiosyncratic stamp on Friday and Saturday night's programs. During the delicate slow passages of Mahler's Fourth, the thought occurred that the woodwinds and horns playing over the strings — creating an atmosphere that could remind one of the Austrian countryside — must have sounded much the same when Mahler led the first rehearsal of this symphony with this same orchestra in October 1901.

Men's lax defeats Holy Cross

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

WORCESTER — Because it was one of the earliest games the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team had ever played, coach Greg Cannella wasn't looking for an overwhelming performance when his team played at Holy Cross Saturday.

But he got one anyway, as the Minutemen won, 18–3.

From the outset Cannella's focus was simple; to see what his players had taken from the pre-season practices, and how they applied what they learned on the field.

Looking for unselfish play, Cannella was happy with the Minutemen's nine different scorers. In addition, seven players contributed assists.

"I thought the guys played well today," Cannella said. "They played unselfishly, which was great. We had sound defense and great goaltending."

UMass (1–0) used three goaltenders on the afternoon, John Kasselakis (two saves), Tim Gilligan (six saves) and Brian Soper (one save). Each allowed just one goal.

The key to the day, however, was the Minuteman offense. The team showed no signs of goal–production problems, despite losing five of last year's top six scorers.

Mike Janowicz, who had one career assist to his credit prior to the Holy Cross game, seized the opportunity presented to him and responded with five goals. He also recorded an assist on a Mike Young goal.

Jay Negus and Mike McKeefrey, who Cannella said will be asked to step up into larger roles this season, each connected for a hat trick on the day.

"Mike [Janowicz] was on the end of a couple of great feeds," Cannella said. "And Jay made some great one–on–one moves. Both of those guys will have to step up this season for us to be successful."

Perhaps most pleasant was the play of UMass' rookie class. John Madigan scored twice in his first collegiate game, while Rick Kunkel recorded his first career goal.

Cannella also had the chance to play most of the athletes on his bench.

"Anytime you can play them it's great," Cannella said. "Those guys work real hard in practice every day. They deserve the chance to play."

UMass got on the board first when Jason Heinze beat Brian Buckley, who finished with three saves in one half of work. Brian Duff worked the second half for the Crusaders (0–1) and made four stops.

Negus scored an unassisted tally and McKeefrey fed Janowicz as the Minutemen jumped out to a 3–0 lead. Negus then worked a pass from behind the net to Janowicz, who beat Buckley low on the goalie's left side.

Young scored and McKeefrey added two before Daniel Lee beat Kasselakis for Holy Cross' first goal. After Janowicz added another, Chris Martens cut from the side of the field to directly in front of the goal, where he fired a shot for a 9–1 lead. Janowicz, McKeefrey and Negus each added another before halftime.

DelPercio and Janowicz pocketed goals in the third quarter, with Madigan upping the advantage with his pair. Kunkel and Negus finished the UMass scoring in the fourth quarter.

Lee and Patrick Kenneally added the other Crusader goals.

the layup or taking a trip to the foul line. The Muskies earned 10 attempts at the line in the first half, compared to UMass' five. But the Minutewomen forwards of Tudman, Yolanda Rayside and Lucia Madajova, who came off the bench to play 13 solid minutes, settled in a rotation that seemed to escape the wrath of the Muskies' strategy.

Despite only going three–of–five from the free throw line and shooting 38 percent in the first half, UMass was able to make the timely shots to keep them in the game. Xavier was held scoreless for four minutes while the Minutewomen went on a 10–0 run, which included a three–pointer, two free throws by Coyner, another three–pointer by MacFarland, and a jumper by Tudman.

But the Muskies fought back with Taru Tuukkanen and Carrie Hamberg converting from the foul line. Amy Hughes tallied one from behind the three–point arc to finish the first half in a 21–21 tie.

The turning point in the game was during the opening minutes of the second half, as Mitchell recovered the ball on a Xavier turnover, which led to a Tudman layup. Mitchell tallied two more assists in the first minute and a half as Kraft nailed two jumpers and Rayside hit a layup to bump the score to 29–21.

After a Muskie timeout Kim Hotz returned the favor as she hit a three–pointer and followed with a layup to keep her team in the game. Tuukkanen also stepped up her play as she scored a quick four points in less than two minutes en route to a 10 point, 10 rebound, four block performance.

Massachusetts continued to dwell in foul trouble as Mitchell had four while Kraft, Tudman and MacFarland each had committed three. But Tudman refused to acknowledge her handicap and converted an uncharacteristic 12–footer off the dribble with 9:01 to go with the score at a comfortable 38–32. Tudman and Coyner's clutch free throws with 3:42 left and Kraft's breakaway layup with :20 remaining clinched the Minutewomen's right to advance to the finals.

Center on Feb. 3, broke UMass' back with a pair of NBA–range three–pointers. The shots put UMass down by nine and the Minutemen would not cut that margin until Clarke hit a 34–footer at the final buzzer.

"They made their run, but we were able to hold them off," said Temple senior Lynard Stewart, who was honored before his final home game. "We made a run and they just couldn't come back from it."

Temple's offense may have provided the winning points, but it was its defense that befuddled the Minutemen, who had 20 turnovers in the game. From the time they grabbed the lead at the 15:11 mark, until a Stewart layup put the Owls up by 13 with 9:46 remaining, UMass committed six turnovers.

"The turnovers killed us," Massachusetts coach Bruiser Flint said. "In the last game we did a good job protecting the ball. Today we were throwing passes without looking.

"You have to be patient against the zone. The guys we've got right now just aren't used to it. They forced us to throw the ball away, and that was the difference right there."

By the time Sanchez dropped in his two key three– pointers, UMass' weariness was already showing.

"We're not playing as aggressively as we were in January," said UMass senior forward Tyrone Weeks, who became the eighth player in school history to record 1,000 points and 800 rebounds. "It seems like [Temple] wanted it more than we did."

Flint, who was assessed a technical in the first half, also noticed his team's fatigue.

"We've got guys playing tentatively," Flint said. "We haven't got somebody diving onto the floor or knocking people around. I guess we have to go back to diving and knocking people around in practice."

One bright spot for Flint was the play of freshman guard Rafael Cruz, who pocketed a career high eight points off the bench, providing a late game spark for the Minutemen.

"I'm happy with Rafael, I think he did well," Flint said. "He didn't play all season. He could've come out there scared to death.

"Now I know who to go to," Flint said as he continued nodding when asked if he would use Cruz again.

For the Minutemen, the task at hand does not get any easier. The team will have to win four games in four days for the A–10 tournament title and the conference's automatic berth in the NCAA tournament.

"The cards are dealt to us," Flint said. "If you start worrying about that, than you've already lost."

to bring the Colonials back within one. With 25 seconds left to play freshman Sarah Hicks hit one of two free throws to put Virginia back up by two, followed by two made free throws from Wetzel that gave the Hokies a four–point lead with 16 seconds remaining.

Junior Khadjia Deas scored on a layup to bring GW back within two points. Two more free throws from Virginia's Michelle Houseright put the Hokies up by four once again. Aguilar nailed a three at the buzzer, but it was too little, too late for the Colonials.

Before last night the Hokies had never advanced past the quarterfinals in the A–10 tournament. UMass knocked Virginia Tech out of the tourney in 1996. Tonight's game is likely to be UMass' only hope of reaching the NCAA's.

"In the last six weeks this team has come together like no team I've ever had," O'Brien said. "They are not the most– talented team in the country by any stretch of the imagination, but when they play together they're as good as anybody."

■ fans

6,218 packed the Mullins Center when B.U. and UMass squared off. However, Friday night's game, which had received significant publicity before gametime, garnered only 3,012 in attendance.

In addition, when UMass upset then–No. 3 New Hampshire on Feb. 22, only 1,800 fans showed up for the Sunday matinee. Crowd attendance in general has been a problem for the Minutemen this year.

The Minutemen used to have no problem drawing rowdy crowds to the Mullins Center. The fans used to be so annoying and vicious that B.U. coach Jack Parker called the Mullins Center one of the toughest places to play, and that the UMass fans were the worst in Hockey East.

Now why can't we have that here in Amherst again?

Fan support is like having a seventh man out on the ice. For teams like B.U., UNH, and Maine, it can sometimes seem like there are eight, nine or 10 men out there going up against you.

"I wish that I could take some of our fans on road games and let them see how the students are at other schools," Mallen said.

To translate and make things simple for everyone out there reading this article: Go to the games on Wednesday and Saturday! The Minutemen are only one point out of a playoff spot and need to win one of their final two games, Wednesday night at 7 p.m. against Boston College, and Saturday night at 7 p.m. against Maine, to make the Hockey East playoffs.

Massachusetts is a hockey state. Everybody loves the Beanpot takes place on the first two Mondays in February, and little kids grow up playing hockey on neighborhood ponds.

UMass hockey tickets don't cost anything. All you have to do is go and pick up a ticket. You can postpone the drinking a few hours (or start it earlier, it's all up to you) and go to the games this week. It would be a shame to see the Minutemen miss out on a playoff spot, so go out there and show your support.

And who knows, maybe some day people will be talking again about how tough of a place the Mullins Center is to play in.

Argentina native made up for it yesterday with 19 points, five steals, four assists and four long range three–pointers.

Two of the bombs came 25 seconds apart in the second half, and turned a one possession game into an insurmountable nine point edge for Temple.

"I told Rasheed [Brokenborough] that we have to play today," Sanchez said. "It doesn't matter if we win or lose, we just have to play."

Brokenborough scored 15 points, and hit perhaps the biggest shot of the game: a second half three that gave the Owls the lead at 36–35 after UMass recaptured it with an 8– 0 run to begin the half.

But it wasn't all sour for UMass. The Minutemen converted on 18–of–19 free throws, all in the second half. And freshman Rafael Cruz, who replaced Jonathan DePina after an ineffective stint with a pair of turnovers and no points, scored a career–high eight points and made his case for additional time at backup point guard.

"I'm happy with Rafael. I think he did well," Flint said. "He didn't play all season. He could have come out there scared to death."

The loss will likely affect who and where UMass plays in the NCAA tournament beginning in two weeks, putting the Minutemen in a pressure situation to perform well in the league tourney.

Temple coach John Chaney said the league is extremely deep this year.

"The conference is good from top to bottom," Chaney said. "It's very difficult to beat up everyone in your conference every day. Sooner or later, the little guy wins."

Flint, however, says UMass will concentrate on winning one game at a time.

"The cards are dealt to us," Flint said. "If you start worrying about that, then you've already lost."

with us all the way until the Poti's and Drury's got into the game," Parker said. "They're a much quicker team, and after getting rid of some guys who played hard and took penalties, they play hard without the penalties now.

"This is the best league in college hockey not because of what we and UNH do, but how good the lower half teams like UMass, Merrimack and Providence are. We come out way ahead from top to bottom against other conferences. UMass has found their identity lately, and are playing well. Tom Poti was the only difference in this game."

While the Minutemen hung in there with BU on the scoreboard both nights, it was the UMass offense that could not keep up with the Terriers. After the return of senior Tim Lovell to the lineup on Friday night, the Minutemen were able to muster a respectable 27 shots on Larocque at the Mullins Center. However, after only registering two shots on Larocque in the first period on Saturday night, UMass was only able to squeeze 12 more shots on the junior goalie the rest of the game (only two shots in the third period).

On the other end of the ice, Regan was once again outstanding on both nights for the Minutemen. After a 39–save performance on Friday night, Regan followed that up with another strong effort on Saturday.

Corazzini's second period goal set up the third period showdown, but it was BU who got the winning jump. After a highstick infraction on the Terriers was not called in the UMass zone, Poti beat the stickless Regan with a shot high to his gloveside at the 2:49 mark of the final frame.

Goals by Russ Bartlett and Poti finished the job, and the Minutemen were not able to muster up a comeback offense.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You must take the time to do things right today. If you can't do them right, then you're best to wait a little longer until you know you can.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You are in no mood to be overlooked today. You expect to be praised for what you are doing — and what you will be if you keep it up.

AQUARIUS (Jan 20.–Feb. 18) — You may be surprised to find yourself a little more inhibited than usual today. Something is holding you back, but it shouldn't last long.

Tez Kraft powers her way to two of her team-high 10 points in UMass' 49–44 victory over Xavier in the A-10 tournament semifinals

Despite a poor shooting performance and rampant foul trouble, the Massachusetts women's basketball team (19–9, 12–5 A–10) advanced to the conference championship game tonight at 5 p.m. at the William D. Mullins Center.

UMass	49
Xavier	44

UMass had clinched the East Division title for the first time in school history on Thursday night with a 63–47 romp over Duquesne in the quarterfinal matchup. The matchup with Virginia Tech will be the first time the Minutewomen have advanced to the A-10 finals.

This game proved to be an even matchup from the start as neither team had a marquee player to neutralize and both teams relied on their defense to win games.

The Minutewomen's current-star-of-the-game has exchanged positions with just about everyone this season. Tez Kraft, Kathy Coyner, Alison MacFarland, Sabriya Mitchell and Kara Tudman as of late, have all taken turns leading the team to their ninth straight win. That has been their strength this season.

The opening minutes of the first half was tainted by wild passes and forced unconventional shots as both squads flirted with disaster. But UMass was first to exit the dusty scramble as Kraft hit a 20–footer at the 19:22 mark for the game's opening points.

Xavier's focus was to force the Massachusetts forwards into foul trouble by passing inside and either making

Youth & fatigue play part in UM's defeat

PHILADELPHIA — The Temple men's basketball team's formidable match-up zone defense exposed

Massachusetts' youth and fatigue, and pushed the Owls to the regular season Eastern Division title in Philadelphia yesterday.

With their 74–66 win at the Apollo of Temple, the Owls (20–7, 13–3 Atlantic 10) earned the East number one seed and a first-round bye in the Atlantic 10 tournament, which starts Wednesday afternoon at the CoreEstates Spectrum. UMass (20–9, 12–4) finishes the regular season third in the East, with a game against West number six Virginia Tech (10–16, 5–11) in the first round of the tourney Wednesday at 2 p.m.

Coming out of halftime, UMass, which had played a virtually ineffective first half, was able to tie the game and then take the lead, using an 8–0 run to grab a 35–33 lead with 15:49 remaining. The key to the run was the team's free throws. After not seeing the line at all in the first half, the Minutemen hit on all six attempts to snatch away the lead. On the afternoon, UMass finished 18–of–19 from the charity stripe.

Temple responded with a three–pointer from Rasheed Brokenborough to give the Owls the lead for good. As UMass committed two consecutive turnovers, Brokenborough connected on a layup and a pair of free throws to give Temple a 40–35 lead.

After Charlton Clarke hit two free throws, Owls point guard Pepe Sanchez, who did not play in Temple's 61–47 win at the William D. Mullins

Terriers take pair from UMass

By Jonna Kansanen
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — The National Hockey League Factory, otherwise known as the Boston University hockey program, showcased another one of its 100 percent natural, no preservative products last Saturday night at Walter Brown Arena. Unfortunately, it was the Massachusetts hockey team who were left with the bad aftertaste.

BU	3
UM	1

Sophomore defenseman Tom Poti registered his first career hat trick to help the No. 4 Terriers (25–5–2, 16–4–2 in Hockey East) to a 5–1 win over the Minutemen (6–23–2, 3–18–1 in HE), which was also the 300th win for BU in its history at Walter Brown Arena. Poti officially declared himself a force to be dealt with in recording his hat trick, but he did have a little help from his friends — more specifically, Hobey Baker Award candidate Chris Drury.

After holding BU's dynamic duo to no points scored in Friday night's 3–1 loss at the Mullins Center, UMass had to deal with their combined five points on the night, as well as Drury's 200th career point (106 goals, 94 assists) with his assist on the first goal of the game.

That first goal was a shocker for the Minutemen, as Poti collected a pass at the left point from Drury, and walked in untouched on the helpless UMass goaltender, Brian Regan (38 saves). Poti blasted a slap shot from the top of the face–off circle past the beleaguered senior goalie for the 1–0 lead at the :42 mark of the first period.

However, the Minutemen would not go quietly, and at the 2:24 mark of the first period, UMass tied up the game. Senior Ryan Furness won the face–off in the Terriers zone, and fellow classmate Tom O'Connor took the slap shot from the right point with freshman R.J. Gates redirecting the puck over BU goalie Michel Larocque's glove for the equalizer.

After freshman Carl Corazzini's goal for the Terriers at the 6:27 mark of the second period, UMass took its second consecutive one–goal deficit in as many nights into the third period against the No. 4 team in the nation, but could not finish the job. Three third period goals by BU put the exclamation point on another win over the Minutemen, and now, UMass' postseason fate is in their own hands.

With Merrimack College's two losses to Providence College over the weekend, the Minutemen are still only one point behind the Warriors for the final postseason conference playoff spot — with a game in hand. Merrimack will have to travel to Walter Brown Arena next weekend, while UMass has two home games this week against No. 7 Boston College (7 p.m., Wednesday) and Maine (7 p.m., Saturday).

After another tough night where all the breaks went to the national powerhouse, Minuteman coach Joe Mallen was flustered but not frustrated over another loss to the Terriers.

"Well, we had our second straight night down only one goal going into the third period goal against this team, and that's what we need to win," Mallen said. "We just can't buy a break against these better teams, so we really have to earn our breaks.

"Tom Poti is a great player, but really, him and Drury were the only differences for BU in this game against us. Other than those two, its a much closer result."

For Terrier coach Jack Parker, he agreed with Mallen on the effect Poti and Drury can bring to a team, and a game. Parker's respect for the UMass program has grown with their development in what he considers the top hockey conference in the nation.

"A real good team battled it out the last two nights with us, and were

Go support your school: Fans are the seventh man

BOSTON— Walter Brown Arena, the home rink of the Boston University Terriers, is what college hockey is all about.

Mike Kobylanski

Even though the building seats around 3,500, it is packed to capacity almost every night and its fans are loud, rowdy, and into the game.

Walter Brown Arena is a place that opposing teams hate to come into for a road game. Teams know that they're going to have to deal with looking up into a sea of red and white that is filled with Terriers sprit. One can only wonder what things would be like if it had a capacity of five or six thousand.

"This is a tough place to play. The support that they get is from the entire city of Boston," Massachusetts hockey coach Joe Mallen said. "It's pretty easy for them to get fired up when they have home crowds like this."

The BU faithful were on Mallen's case even before the opening faceoff. Several fans hung over the glass to shout some kind words of encouragement to Mallen as he made his way over to the UMass bench.

BU hockey is just as much about the off the Ice festivities than it is about the action on the ice. There is the sieve sign which hangs behind the opposing goalie. There is the BU band leading the chants from its spot high in the back corner of the rink.

And it's not just that BU fans are hockey illiterate either. They know the sport. Like when Chris Drury received a standing ovation for his 200th career point, or when hats flew onto the ice after Tom Poti netted a hat trick. And we can't forget the standing ovation that the fans gave their team in final minute of regulation.

To put things into perspective, how can B.U. top UMass athletically? First, let's compare the facilities.

The Mullins Center is one of the best collegiate arenas in the country. Walter Brown Arena is a decaying hole in an alley on Babcock Street. The Mullins Center seats around 9,000 for hockey games. Walter Brown Arena seats 3,700 with standing room only.

So what makes things so tough about playing in Walter Brown? It's simple and it's a redundant theme: the fans.

UMass drew 7,089 fans (the largest turnout ever for a UMass game) on Dec. 1, 1995 when the Terriers came calling to Amherst. A year earlier

UM one win from NCAA's

By Jackie Leroux

It has been a season of milestones for the Massachusetts women's basketball team.

With a win over Virginia Tech on Jan. 4, UMass head coach Joanie O'Brien became the winningest coach in Massachusetts women's basketball. With a Jan. 18 win over Fordham she achieved the century mark in wins. On Jan. 11 UMass defeated St. Joseph's for the first time ever on the Hawks home court. On Feb. 19, UMass defeated George Washington for just the second time in school history.

Senior point guard Sabriya Mitchell broke UMass' all–time assists record with 547 assists in the season. With UMass' win over St. Bonaventure in the final game of the season, the Minutewomen won their first–ever East Division title.

Now, with last night's win 49–44 over Xavier, UMass is headed to the final round of the Atlantic 10 tournament for the first time in school history. Their current nine game win streak also ties a school record for consecutive wins. They will face off against Virginia Tech in the championship game tonight at 5 p.m. in the William D. Mullins Center. Should they win that game, they will head to the NCAA's for just the second time in school history.

"It feels great... I've got four trophies myself as a player. It will be awful fun to get the chance to maybe put my name on another one," Massachusetts head coach Joanie O'Brien said. "Our goal all year long has been to get to this point, to have the chance to win this thing."

Virginia Tech advanced to the final round after narrowly defeating defending A–10 champion George Washington last night, 73–72. The two teams were neck and neck through the game from start to finish. The score was tied 14 different times, and the teams changed leads nine times. The biggest lead held by either team was six points.

George Washington was led by co–rookie of the year Elisa Aguilar, who poured in a game–high 30 points, but it wasn't enough for the Colonials to hang on in the waning minutes. The score was notched at 62–62 with 2:02 remaining in the second half when Hokies freshman Tere Williams hit a layup to put Virginia Tech ahead for good.

Freshman guard Amy Wetzel made two free throws to put the Hokies up by four before George Washington's Noelia Gomez drilled a three–pointer

PHILADELPHIA—This one truly hurt.

Forget about the three losses in four games. Forget about the mediocre performance against St. Joseph's, and the St. Bonaventure game that got away. Because the only game that had any impact on the season of the Massachusetts men's basketball team was yesterday at Temple, and the Minutemen came up well short, 74–66.

UMass (20–9, 12–4 in Atlantic 10), who was the at the top of the A–10 Eastern Division all season long, dropped to the number three seed heading into this week's conference tournament (March 4–7), and therefore lost the right to a valuable first round bye. To recapture the league throne they owned for five consecutive seasons (1992–96), the Minutemen now have to win four games in four days.

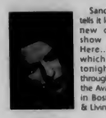
UMass opens up Wednesday afternoon at 2 p.m. against Virginia Tech, and may have a date in the second round against George Washington. Massachusetts beat the Hokies 68–59 on Jan. 24 in Blacksburg, Va.

The Temple Owls, now the number one seed in the Eastern Division, have a far easier road ahead of them. Winners of seven straight league games, the Owls proved yesterday that they are, without a doubt, the best the A–10 has to offer.

Temple, which moves to 20–7, 13–3, swept the season series against UMass for the first time the 1990–91 campaign. They accomplished it with arguably the best matchup zone defense in the nation.

Though UMass responded with 50 percent shooting and six three–pointers, the Minutemen committed 22 fouls and had far too many turnovers. The Owls got to the free throw line 32 times, while Massachusetts' first free throws came in the opening moments of the second half.

"You have to be patient against the zone, and we weren't," Massachusetts coach Bruiser Flint said. "Not Edgar [Padilla] and Carmelo [Travieso], their mouths salivated when we played Temple."



Temple point guard Pepe Sanchez didn't play when the Owls beat UMass in Amherst back on Feb. 3, but the University, GEO agree to temporary settlement

By Jason Eiseman
Collegian Staff

After two days of negotiating with a mediator, the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) and the University of Massachusetts administration reached an agreement yesterday, ending two years of contract negotiations.

This temporary settlement must be approved by GEO members and the UMass Board of Trustees before it can be enacted. In less than a year, on March 1, 1999, contract negotiations between GEO and the UMass administration are scheduled to begin again.

Both sides seemed to be pleased with the job of the mediator, Susan Brown, who brought the two sides to an agreement after two days of mediation. Brown, a professional mediator, was suggested by GEO.

In a press release, Chancellor David K. Scott and Susan Pearson, Chief Negotiator for the administration, announced the state would help fund stipend increases and the University would use more money than the administration originally offered.

"We are particularly pleased that graduate students will now receive precisely the increases we had previously proposed and announced two weeks ago, and that departments can begin recruiting at more competitive levels," Scott said.

As part of the settlement, the administration has agreed to voluntarily recognize GEO as a union, which means in the future GEO will be protected by a collective bargaining law. After declaring impasse two weeks ago, the administration argued the declaration was legal because GEO was not covered by collective bargaining laws.

GEO filed an unfair labor practice charge with the Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission, and despite

Prison uprising ends; 3 rebel leaders killed

RIO DE JANEIRO, Brazil (AP) — Inmates at a crowded jail in Brazil's Amazon ended a 28–hour uprising Sunday, surrendering to authorities after killing three leaders of the rebellion, news reports said.

Two of the victims were thrown to their deaths off a prison wall.

Some 280 inmates at the Sao Jose prison in Belem, about 2,000 miles north of Rio de Janeiro, surrendered after officials allowed relatives in for brief visits, TV Globo News said.

The rebellion began as a jailbreak on Saturday, apparently over poor conditions.

The prisoners seized nine hostages, including a priest and two nuns, and threatened to kill them unless authorities provided cars, guns, bullets and bulletproof vests for 50 prisoners, the station said.

After prison authorities refused to negotiate, inmates who wanted to end the rebellion killed the three leaders and another prisoner.

Boy Scouts of America ordered by court

TRENTON, N.J. (AP) — The Boy Scouts of America's ban on admitting gays violates New Jersey's laws against discrimination, a state appeals court ruled yesterday.

The court said the Scouts' decision to kick James Dale out of the Boy Scouts because he is gay should be overturned. An attorney for Dale said this is the first time any appeals court has ruled against the Boy Scouts in challenges to their exclusion of homosexuals.

Dale earned 30 merit badges, seven achievement honors and other awards, and was an Eagle Scout during his 12 years in the organization. He last served as an assistant scoutmaster.

He was expelled by the Monmouth Council of the Boy Scouts in 1990 after the group learned from a newspaper article that he was gay. He sued and a lower court judge ruled in the Scouts' favor in 1995, calling homosexuality "a serious moral wrong" and agreeing with the Boy Scouts of America that the group is a private organization and has a constitutional right to decide who can belong.

New Jersey's anti–discrimination law was expanded in 1992 to prohibit most organizations from discriminating on the basis of sexual orientation.

Amherst, UMass police issue public safety alert

University of Massachusetts Police and the Amherst Police department issued a safety awareness alert yesterday to warn the UMass and Amherst community about an alleged individual annoying a woman at a local bus stop.

Both police departments received a report on Friday night from a woman who said while waiting at a bus stop an individual was in a vehicle and annoying her.

The incident occurred at the bus stop on North Pleasant Street near the intersection of Massachusetts Avenue.

"The vehicle was described as an older model, 1980–1985, Chevrolet Impala. It was grayish blue and had extensive body damage. The operator of the vehicle was a Caucasian male in his early to mid sixties with a disheveled appearance," the public safety alert stated.

"This man made the young woman feel very uncomfortable," UMass Police Chief John Luippold said.

He added that the woman stated the vehicle operator allegedly "stopped the car, stared at her and began to open his car door as a possible attempt to invite her in," Luippold said.

UMass Police said students should exercise caution when approaching someone in a motor vehicle who may be looking for directions or other information.

Anyone having knowledge of similar incidents or who sees the vehicle in question should contact Amherst Police at 256–4012 or UMass Police at 545–2121.

Student government prepares for elections, 3 upcoming debates

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

With elections a week away, candidates for President and Trustee of the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) are busy with three upcoming debates; two today and the other on Sunday.

This afternoon from 3–5 p.m., candidates will participate in an open debate in the Student Union Cape Cod Lounge. All students are encouraged to attend.

Becky Friedman, Southwest Residential Area Senator at– large, who is involved in the debate planning, said students will be able to ask the candidates questions.

"The main event of it is for students to have a time to ask the candidates questions," Friedman said.

The candidates will also be discussing their platforms and plans for action if they are elected Friedman said.

"Candidates will give a small speech about their platform...but students will be the one's they address the issues to," Friedman said.

Friedman hopes the debate will increase student voter turnout and bring awareness of the elections and issues the candidates are supporting to the student body.

"Hopefully it will get students more involved and have greater awareness of the issues and increase voter turnout," Friedman said.

Chancellor of Elections Carlos Alvarez said he hopes this debate will enable students to make a more informed decision when voting next week.

"I hope a lot of students attend. It's a great opportunity for the students to interact with the candidates so they can make a more informed decision," Alvarez said.

The debate is open to the entire University Community and students will have a chance to find out where candidates stand on various issues.

Candidates will participate in another debate tonight at 6:30 p.m. in the Hillel House which is also open to the public to discuss issues that affect Jewish students.

A final debate will take place this Sunday night from 7–9 p.m. and will be televised on UVC–TV 19.

Representatives from UVC–TV 19, WMUA and the Massachusetts Daily Collegian will be asking the candidates a series of questions. The public is welcome to attend the televised debate.

SGA candidates address Jewish issues at Hillel

By Bryan Schwartzman
Collegian Staff

With Student Government Association elections approaching, the candidates for Student Trustee and President are taking advantage of opportunities to address various student groups on campus.

Tonight, at 6:30, the SGA candidates will hold an open forum in the Hillel House to address specific concerns of Jewish students.

The forum is organized through the Jewish Student Union (formerly the Hillel Council) who hold their weekly meetings every Tuesday from 6–7 p.m. Candidates will take questions in addition to making their presentations.

Jewish Student Union President Louisa Shein said it is a good opportunity for SGA candidates to present their platforms.

"We want to create an awareness of the issues, we also want to raise voter awareness in the Jewish population and get them voting in the SGA elections," Shein said.

"We want to see how they plan to meet the needs of Jewish students...we'll see who's thought about it and who hasn't," she said.

This is the second year Hillel House has hosted this forum prior to elections.

Presidential candidate Jesse Burchfield said all of the candidates

UMass Inter–Religious Project hosts interfaith service

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Correspondent

In celebration of the 23rd International Sunday, the Interfaith Service Council of Amherst and the University of Massachusetts Inter–Religious Project held an Inter–Religious Celebration Sunday afternoon in the Student Union Ballroom.

The event marked the recognition of more than sixteen religious cultures and faiths coming together to share, teach, and learn from their differences and the offerings of their diverse religious backgrounds.

Religions ranging from Baha'i Faith, Cambodian Buddhism, Christianity, Hinduism, Islam, Jainism, Judaism, Unitarian–Universalists and Sufism gathered to present their religion in celebration of the International Sunday.

Many of the presenters took center stage to talk about their religious beliefs while others performed religious ceremonies, rituals or prayers.

The Muslim Student Organization performed a reading of the sacred Qu'ran, the words of God revealed to the leader Muhammed. The unchanged text over so many centuries, brought tears and emotions to many individuals.

As Jessica Rohm, Master of Ceremonies said, "this is a very special evening for individuals of diverse religions to congregate and learn from one another about their beliefs and to celebrate the many diverse religions, regardless of their differences."

As the representative for Jainism implied, "Just as Jainism holds the belief that there's no way to worship our religion, so does it apply to all of the religions."

Keynote speaker Ingrid Askew, coordinating director for "The Interfaith Pilgrimage of the Middle Passage," addressed the issues of yesterday's agreement, GEO said there are no plans to withdraw the charges.

Pearson said because the administration is willing to voluntarily recognize GEO, the state will provide the funding for additional stipend increases. In addition, some of the major issues agreed upon, such as affirmative action and child care, were not far from the administration's original proposal.

"I think the mediator did an excellent job," Pearson said. The complaints GEO has made with the Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission are now moot, she said.

Among the many issues which have been agreed upon in the new contract are increased funding for affirmative action, a committee to discuss alternative health options, and increased funding for child care.

The administration agreed to increase child care funding from $100,000 to $300,000 a year, the same number the administration offered in their earlier proposal.

Funding for the affirmative action program at UMass will be increased from $340,000 to $640,000 for the 1998–1999 school year.

The total wage increase totals 45% in the minimum wage for all graduate employees. According to a GEO press release, every employee is guaranteed a minimum raise of approximately $660 for 1998–1999.

"I think we have a fairly good contract," said Mahmood Ketabchi, GEO President. "I feel wonderful, very relieved. This contract looks a lot better than what they were imposing on us."

Ketabchi said he is pleased with the benefits graduate students will receive in the contract. He said it is very important for the contract to be ratified as soon as possible so graduate employees can enjoy the benefits of the contract.

"We came out of mediation with more victories," Ketabchi said. "The administration was forced to make a lot of movement."

Jon Zerolnick Co-Chief Negotiator for GEO also said the administration was forced to make a lot of movement at mediation.

"For months the administration was unwilling to move on certain issues," Zerolnick said. He said one of the factors in getting the administration to make compromises was the mediator.

Both sides said they are hoping that what happened with these two year negotiations will not be the norm, especially when the two sides must return to the bargaining table in less than a year.

"I hope that this was simply an anomaly," Pearson said. She said she hopes the next contract negotiations end more amicably.

Ketabchi said the answer is for GEO to get more organized earlier. He said starting in September GEO should be campaigning for a new contract. He said these negotiations should be over in three months. Ketabchi said by May 1991 there should be a new contract.

Israel may withdraw from Lebanon

JERUSALEM — Top Israeli officials sent strong new signals Sunday that Israel wants to withdraw from southern Lebanon, where a costly war of attrition has been steadily claiming soldiers' lives. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told his Cabinet that Israel was willing to withdraw from southern Lebanon, provided Israel's northern frontier could be secured.

"If the Lebanese government will cooperate with us in making appropriate security arrangements in south Lebanon, we will be happy to get out of Lebanon in the framework of implementation of U.N. Resolution 425," Netanyahu told his ministers.

That 1978 resolution, passed after a brief Israeli invasion, calls for Israel's unconditional withdrawal from southern Lebanon, and for the deployment of the Lebanese army and U.N. forces to ensure security along the Lebanese-Israeli border.

On Friday, Netanyahu said he had "no qualms" about implementing the U.N. resolution, as long as Israel had "the necessary security safeguards."

Science Minister Michael Eitan said Sunday that Netanyahu's remarks marked a substantive change in Israel's position.

"We will defend our north from the international border," said Eitan. "No one wants to stay in Lebanon; thus we think it better to withdraw."

Uri Lubrani, Israel's top official for Lebanon affairs, also suggested Israel was willing to modify its political goals in Lebanon.

"This is a new thing... it means that we are willing to talk today — full stop — about security," Lubrani told Israel's Channel One TV. "We have gototen off the issue of peace, off the issue of normalization."

As the death toll in Lebanon has mounted, the Israeli government has been faced with a growing grassroots movement calling for the unilateral withdrawal from Lebanon.

Since 1985 — when Israel created a security buffer zone in southern Lebanon — nearly 200 Israeli soldiers have been killed fighting Hezbollah and other guerrillas. Last week, Hezbollah fighters killed three Israeli soldiers and seriously wounded six others.

The Israelis suffered a record 39 deaths in southern Lebanon last year. In addition, 73 soldiers were killed en route to Lebanon when two military helicopters crashed in February 1997.

The Maariv newspaper said Sunday that Netanyahu's comments last week were in response to signals from Syria that it wants to renew the long-stalled peace talks between the two countries.

The newspaper, quoting "secret reports," said Syria had indicated its interest in resuming talks in remarks made last week by the Syrian ambassador to the United States, Walid Mualem, in a lecture to a closed forum in Baltimore.

Two top aides to Netanyahu, political adviser Uzi Arad and Cabinet Secretary Danny Naveh, left for Europe on Sunday, apparently to investigate the Syrian issue, the newspaper said. Israel-Syrian talks have been cut off for nearly two years. Defense Minister Yitzhak Mordechai was the first senior Israeli official to refer to U.N. resolution 425 in a speech six weeks ago, saying at the time he was willing to withdraw troops in exchange for guarantees that Israel would not be attacked.

Big Rally promotes service

By Laura Jakutowicz
Collegian Correspondent

Students will have the opportunity to learn more about how to participate in community service when the University of Massachusetts Community Service Program holds its annual "Big Rally" conference on Saturday, March 7, from 11:30 a.m.–3:00 p.m., in Campus Center Room 163.

The Big Rally will provide lunch from 11:45 a.m. until 12:30 p.m., when keynote speaker Glenroy Buchanan of the Amherst Shelter for Adolescents will speak about the impact that volunteering has for community organizations and their members, as well as for students.

Workshops will be held afterwards until 3 p.m. which will focus on how registered student organizations (RSOs) and Residence Assistants (RAs) will be able to incorporate community service into their plans and programs.

The Big Rally promotes the importance of service on campus as well as gives students the tools to create their own service opportunities.

The Big Rally has been held annually for the last 5 years. "This year we've made it more action–oriented with Resident Assistants and students on floors or Registered Student Organizations. The hope is to incorporate RSOs with different community agencies. That way we will indirectly increase the number of students participating in community service. RAs are now required to do programs within the dorms. We thought that this would be a great way to bring community service to the dorms as a program," Community Service Program Coordinator, Flavia Stanley said.

"We are targeting residence halls and RSOs to help develop service programs and to build unity in the halls," said Katie Reppert, MACC/VISTA volunteer. Service will involve weekend projects with hands–on experience in Amherst, and other regional groups like Nueva Esperanza in Holyoke.

The workshops will be concerned with the topics of "Cultural Sensitivity and Community Service," "How to Integrate Community Service into your Career Plans," "How to Integrate Service into your Residence Hall or Student Organization," and "Creating Partnerships Between Student groups and the Larger Community."

Americorp representative Farhad Meskoob will be present among other field representatives to discuss jobs and internships in the community service field.

"These give you experience you can use further down the line such as team work and community building. They provide a variety of work skills that can be used in any job," Reppert said.

The registration deadline for the Big Rally is Friday, March 6, 1998 by noon. Students can register by calling the Community Service Program at 545–3368.

A breath of fresh air

The town of Amherst finally got something right.

After devoting time at recent town soirees to debating such vital issues as how many 15-minute parking spaces there should be behind Pinocchio's, Amherst officials have actually done something useful.

Marty Keane

Taking a cue from slightly more urbane Los Angeles, the Amherst Board of Health unanimously passed a ban on smoking in all Amherst bars on February 11. And if the town gets their way, area bars will "voluntarily" begin imposing the ban on April 1.

Let the countdown begin!

It looks like those of us who don't like frequenting Amherst's booming bar scene might actually be able to enjoy a night out on the town without having to have any of the following happen anymore: going home and having your clothes smell like they were just in a humidor, turning around and catching a cancerous whiff of air, or, if you're like me and have to cope with asthma, generally giving up the function of breathing for two hours.

All this so we can stand around making snide comments like "Gee, the dance floor at Delano's seems to have expanded to nine tiles tonight!" What a trade–off, let me tell you.

I honestly believe that a smoking ban in Amherst would be almost a non–issue for smokers if there were viable alternatives anywhere nearby. I'm sorry, but the Fire & Water Cafe in Northampton does not count.

However, do I feel sorry for this aromatic subset of our college population? Not in the least bit. To have even the slightest degree of sympathy for a group of people who are too addicted to have any concern for the health and well– being of those around them is not only a mistake but hypocritical. Hell, if they don't care what they're doing to themselves and others, why should I feel sorry for them?

"If someone wants to smoke, I say go right ahead, knock six minutes off your life every time you light up one of those insidious cancer sticks — just don't force me to breathe in your noxious fumes."

As for the argument that drinking alcohol in a bar causes an equal amount of damage to your liver as smoking does to your lungs, fine, maybe it does. But if I'm in a bar pounding beers on a nightly basis, the adverse consequences of my actions affect only me, not everyone else in the bar.

It truly bothers me that all these people around campus are bitching because they think they are being singled out and discriminated against just because they smoke.

Now, please don't get me wrong. I loathe discrimination against people as much as the next guy, but let's get serious here for a minute. We're not talking about the kind of discrimination Martin Luther King and Susan B. Anthony fought against. As far as I'm concerned, smokers should have no right to smoke in public. Anywhere. Any time.

How am I supposed to feel sorry for a group of people whose filthy, smelly (not to mention physically harmful) habit has contributed to the deaths of thousands of non– smokers because of their own self–centered indifference?

I fully understand the argument that smoking is a choice and that us non–smokers have wisely chosen not to take up this fatal habit. If someone wants to smoke, I say go right ahead, knock six minutes off your life every time you light up one of those insidious cancer sticks — just don't force me to breathe in your noxious fumes.

You see, people have a right to smoke if they choose, but to force smokers to inhale their poison is not only unfair, it is inhumane. While smokers arrogantly puff the night away with natty a concern for those around them, those of us who do not smoke are forced to breathe stale, smoke–infested air. And it's not as if we're outside where the air actually circulates.

I implore those of you who do smoke to think for a minute about what you are doing unwittingly does to those around you, never mind yourself.

Take an interest in SGA

I probably picked a bad night to go to a University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) meeting. I knew that elections for president and trustee were coming up, and I wanted to check out what was going on in the senate. I wanted to put faces and names together, since most or all of the candidates will be senate members.

As I said, I picked a bad night to check out a senate meeting. No one mentioned that I would need a raincoat and some lessons in duck and cover maneuvers. Clods of mud whistled past my ears, and I avoided being caught in the cross–fire between President Lia Wong and the senate body by the narrowest of margins.

From what I saw that night, relations between President Wong and the senate have deteriorated somewhat in the past year, so that there is a fundamental lack of respect between them. When reading a document before the senate that night, the President used language which was inappropriate, slandering the senate and undermining the respect that she should have had as a leader. She was laughed at for the way she comported herself, and the senate body was then chastised by Speaker Peter Kilbourne.

Alexis Pushkar

In light of what I observed, the elections during the second week of March are coming at a time when change is needed. I have talked off and on with senators over the past year, and many have expressed the opinion that Lia Wong could have handled her presidency with more grace and with more of the interests of the entire campus community in mind, as opposed to the interests of some groups, such as ALANA.

Her term as president is coming to a close, and soon UMass students will have a chance to vote for someone new. Who will they vote for and how will they choose? How can students be more informed so that they know who they are voting for and what kind of a leader that person will be?

Each candidate will have their own ideas about what the job of president and trustee of UMass means, and thus each candidate will bring a different set of ideas to the table. Unlike national elections, there are no political parties in SGA, although there is no doubt that each candidate can be classified as liberal, conservative, or middle–of–the–road.

Of course the jobs themselves require that each leader have the interests of the students at heart. The president represents the voice of the students, as the senators do, but the president does not represent a specific area, and thus needs a better grasp of the campus as a whole. The trustee is the student representative to the Board of Trustees. Both people must be eloquent communicators and hold the interests of a dynamic campus of students dear to their hearts.

But how can students find out what is going on?

There will be a great deal of campaigning over the next week and a half. There will be flyers on campus, articles in the Collegian, and some debates. Beyond that, if you have a question about senate or the elections, call the senator from your living area or the candidates themselves. The SGA office in the Student Union can provide the names of these people, if you don't already know.

The senators and candidates are excited about politics on this campus, and they want to hear from you, especially if you have ideas about things you want changed. Changing things to match the interests of the current student body is what they were elected to do.

I'm a big proponent of informed voting, but it's hard to be informed about everything that goes on in SGA. However, before the upcoming elections we all should try to figure out what's going on.

They are actually serious about what they do. The week after the mud bath they held a meeting — when they didn't have to — in order to actually accomplish something for the students. If they are willing to help us out, we should help them out by taking an interest in what they do and turning out to vote in the elections.

Check out the senate meeting this Wednesday at 7 p.m. downstairs in the Campus Center to get a feel for what SGA does. And you can leave your raincoat at home. It was just one bad night.

A proposal for Spring Concert

To the editor:

I noticed the advertisement placed in your paper last week (Feb. 25) by the University Productions & Concerts (UPC) organization announcing the cancellation of this year's Spring Concert. Spring Concert is a University of Massachusetts tradition dating back over 20 years. Acts like the Grateful Dead, the Beastie Boys, Bob Dylan, Phish and Blues Traveler have performed at Spring Concert. This will be the second time in three years without a Spring Concert.

My understanding is that UPC is low on funds and extremely low on morale. The primary reason for this is their inability to secure shows that students want to see. It is unrealistic for students with no training to try to compete with established promoters for talent. People like myself who promote concerts full–time have developed relationships with agents, managers and talent over the years. A student who has limited office hours and limited connections cannot compete on an equal level.

I have a standing offer with the Student Activities Office to co–present shows with the UPC in the Student Union Ballroom, Curry Hicks Cage, the Fine Arts Center and other venues on campus. In my proposal, UPC would produce, publicize, advertise and market the shows. They would need a large and well–run organization to fulfill these tasks, but I believe that by having six to 10 quality concerts on campus each semester, they would have no problem finding students interested in getting involved. These students would then be able to develop skills and connections that could help them find employment in the concert industry after graduation.

I have been promoting concerts in Amherst and Northampton for the last five years. During this time, I have promoted shows by acts including Rusted Root, Blues Traveler, Dave Mathews Band, 311, The Wallflowers, Ani DiFranco, The Black Crowes, Phish, Jewel, Paula Cole and The Mighty Mighty Bosstones.

With the exception of shows I have promoted at the privately managed Mullins Center, none of these shows have taken place on the University of Massachusetts campus. This is due to my inability to gain access to the venues on campus. Most of these shows have been on the Smith and Mt Holyoke College campuses. I have excellent working relationships with The Network at Mt. Holyoke and The Recreation Council at Smith. I also work closely with the student activities offices at both schools.

This past week, when I heard that the UPC was falling apart, I made them an offer to promote this year's Spring Concert. Using the remaining UPC budget, along with any other funds available from the Student Government Association (SGA) to pay production and security expenses, as well as subsidizing talent costs, I could put together a successful concert including acts like Ben Harper, A Tribe Called Quest, Sonic Youth, Foo Fighters, The Mighty Mighty Bosstones, moe., Strangefolk, Letters to Cleo, Matchbox 20, Burning Spear and others. All of the above acts are available and looking to play schools this spring. I would pay the bulk of the talent costs and in exchange sell tickets off campus and arrange concessions and sponsorship. Unlike last year, tickets would be free for UMass students. I am convinced that by working with an outside professional promoter UPC could once again become a strong and successful organization and the Spring Concert tradition would return to prominence.

Marisol a great take

To the editor:

I was interested in the review of Marisol (currently at the Rand Theatre) by Alexis S. Wiggins that appeared in yesterday's Collegian (March 2).

I would like to add to this favorable review that I found the performance I attended last Saturday night to be one of the most memorable engagements I have had in the theatre in the last 50 years. Those who were with me reported a similar reaction. It may not speak as personally and as powerfully to others as it did to me and to those I saw it with, but I experienced a play of enormous contemporary political and spiritual power, with a pungent and poetic script wrapped up in an absolutely stunning and exhilarating UMass graduate student production. I would strongly urge those looking for something to do this weekend to consider taking in one of the remaining presentations.

Posters with a point

To the editor:

As I'm sure everyone is well aware, there is an election next week for SGA president and student trustee; to avoid the overwhelming number of posters that have been put up is impossible. However, as a student walking around campus and sitting in classrooms, I have noticed one peculiar fact: most of the posters have a name, a position, and the dates of the election. There is nothing else on the poster telling me why I should vote for these people, except in one notable instance.

Jesse Burchfield and Brenda Fitzpatrick have shown a remarkable peculiarity in their postering campaign: they actually have a platform expressed on some of their posters. What is even more peculiar, given the norms of typical campaigns, is that they appear to be — oddly enough — interested in student issues. In the upcoming debates and forums, perhaps they will uphold this conviction. If this is the case, they have at least earned my vote.

Employees concerned about plight of homeless

To the editor:

This letter is in response to Ken McDonald's editorial (Feb. 27) regarding the expulsion of homeless individuals from the UMass Campus Center.

The Campus Center has no known policy regarding shelter for homeless individuals in the Campus Center/Student Union Complex. This said, the University and the employees described have unquestionable concern and undeniable respect for the plight of homeless men, women and children. To suggest, however sarcastically, that Campus Center employees are trained to detect "contagious viruses" emanating from homeless individuals, or that Campus Center employees have no concern for homeless individuals is simply falsification of fact.

Democracy in action

If we look closely at the U.S. media's depictions of Iraq, one cannot miss the smugness and condescension with which Iraq is treated. Average citizens training with AK–47 rifles. A state–organized rally of 300 black–clad women protesting the effect of economic sanctions. And everywhere, colored murals of Saddam Hussein in various attires. The suggestion here is simple: What right does an upstart Third World nation run by a tyrant have to stand up to the United States? And if we say we demand complete, unfettered access to Saddam's numerous presidential palaces and any other site we think might hide biological or chemical weapons, then he'd better comply — or else!

Yet there is some evidence that the citizens of the United States are starting to see through our government's claim that since the break–up of the Soviet Union, we have been elected global cop. But when a government becomes so intoxicated by its own power — or as President Bush said, the right to kick some ass — who dare confront it?

To sell its war plans against Iraq, President Clinton sent Madeleine Albright, William Cohen and Sandy Berger to historically conservative Ohio State University in late February to hold a "town meeting." With Cable News Network (CNN) presiding, and the event being sent to millions of homes, what followed was a public relations nightmare for the Clinton administration. Protestors, estimated at anywhere from two dozen to 200, repeatedly hooted and chanted, totally disrupting what had been planned as a commercial for war. Two protestors were especially eloquent, with one

"but he and his fellow activists, whatever their number, subverted the event and showed that Americans would not fall in the line and endorse the impending bombing."

studious young man confronting Albright on the double standard permeating U.S. foreign policy: Why do certain nations (Iraq) get challenged on their weapons' programs while others (Israel, East Timor, Turkey) get permission to build on? Albright, the former professor, looked flustered as she fielded his probing inquiry.

Late in the program, another dissident surfaced. He observed that if this had been a real town meeting, citizens would have been allowed to make statements; instead he called it an event staged by CNN to back the official view — "It's war time!" But he and his fellow activists, whatever their number, subverted the event and showed that Americans would not fall in line and endorse the impending bombing. Here on cable television, in all its mid–day rowdiness, countless citizens saw their own doubts and concerns about the need to bomb Iraq validated. Viewers saw that while democracy in action is indeed messy, it does make its point: We're not buying it.

More than 30 years ago, at a time when the Vietnam war engulfed the nation, a besieged leader named Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. offered his diagnosis for the ills that beset this country. He identified the triple pillars of racism, militarism and materialism as the under–pinnings of the American empire — and those three isms continue to guide our foreign policy.

In terms of Iraq, a whole nation is demonized because its skin color is different. As historian Howard Zinn noted recently: "We are told if we just get rid of Saddam, everything will be fine." Our militarism, amassed at such a colossal cost, can compel almost any nation to do our bidding (Grenada, Panama, Nicaragua).

And our materialism shows up in our penchant for gas– guzzling vehicles and cheap oil — and Iraq has plenty of the latter. Fortunately, we also have plenty of citizens who refuse to divorce themselves from the suffering Iraqi people and embrace the rationale for their destruction. Perhaps, just perhaps, the three pillars are starting to crumble and the human needs of all people can surface.

Bernhard's unique comic blend

Sandra Bernhard brings her new one-woman show "I'm Still Here...Damn It!" to the Avalon Ballroom in Boston, beginning tonight.

Call her what you will — obnoxious, arrogant, perverse — but give Sandra Bernhard credit for being her own woman. In the glitzy world of Hollywood and show business, where nobody dares to step out of line and speak their own mind, Bernhard proudly stands out as an enigma — not easily pigeonholed into some cookie–cutter image that seemingly everyone in the entertainment world tries so desperately to fit into.

Case in point: ask Bernhard to share her thoughts on Ellen DeGeneres and she says without hesitation, "I just don't know what her trip is." The Bill Clinton/Monica Lewinsky scandal: "I don't care who he's screwing, my stock portfolio has never been better."

In fact, many have compared her to a female version of outspoken shock–jock Howard Stern. According to her, the two are good buddies, as any of Stern's faithful listeners can attest to. "Any comparison to Howard is a compliment in my book," she says. Although many see Bernhard as an intimidating presence, the comedian disagrees. "I don't necessarily consider myself to be that intimidating," she says. "I mean, I don't go out of my way to fuck with people."

Taking a break from her hectic television and film schedules, Bernhard has created the performance piece entitled "I'm Still Here...Damn It!," a volatile cocktail of stand–up, cabaret and performance art.

Following a four– month sold out run at New York City's Westbeth Theatre Center, Bernhard brings her deliciously pointed look at society and '90s culture to Boston's Avalon Ballroom for six performances, beginning tonight (tickets are still available).

According to Bernhard, this new one–woman show comes out of her own cultural observations and is loosely based on the work of Debbie Reynolds, Mary Tyler Moore and Carol Burnett, all of whom she considers Inspirational.

In contrast to her previous work, Bernhard considers "I'm Still Here..." to be "much more emotional and not driven by politics." While she is known to most as the slightly insane waitress Nancy on "Roseanne," Bernhard feels she's primarily a live performer and ultimately considers the stage to be her base of operations.

"I'm Still Here...Damn It!" is chock-full of Bernhard's devastatingly honest wit. Like a good umpire, she calls 'em like she sees it, which means people like Naomi Campbell

Proyas' imagination manipulation

By Bryan McAllister

DARK CITY
Directed by Alex Proyas with Rufus Sewell, Jennifer Connelly, Keifer Sutherland
Playing at Hampshire Six Theaters

Alex Proyas, the Australian director of The Crow, has his hands all over Dark City, manipulating us with a visually arresting style that best suggests a movie comic book. Thankfully, for all his desire to shock and intrigue, Proyas never fully subjects us to the disturbing ideas that flood today's nihilistic music videos.

In fact, the only disturbing thing in Dark City is that its enemy aliens all look like Uncle Fester from the Addams Family. I kept looking for Christopher Lloyd to show up.

Proyas' music video background is apparent throughout the film, a science–fiction/film noir send–up filled with big ideas, stark images and quick shifts in the storyline. Filming in murky yellows and wonderfully orchestrating his action to the music score, Proyas shows off a visionary style unique, absurd and ultimately, fleeting.

Dark City opens with the camera sweeping around and in– between its apocalyptic creation, a 1940's–type Manhattan where the occupants live in perpetual night, unknowingly the subjects of an alien study to find out what makes us human.

The aliens, called Strangers, are able to telekinetically change the environment — buildings take new shape, stairs re–form, doors suddenly appear, and the entire city becomes different. The inhabitants don't know this, though, because the Strangers also have the ability to put everyone to sleep simultaneously. Yet, for some reason, they can't kill a man with a knife and they need a crazed psychologist to do all their work for them.

Stupid implausabilities aside, Dark City, like last year's much worse The Fifth Element, combines visual pulp with big ideas. In this case, it's how our memories make us unique. City dwellers like our hero, John Murdock (Rufus Sewell), are implanted with fake memories and then switched with others. Murdock wakes up prematurely, and finds himself a suspect of six murders. At least he has a beautiful wife. Or does he?

She's a dark–eyed lounge singer, played with some macabre spark and affection by Jennifer Connelly. The love story, given little time, is the film's best story idea.

It's subtle proposal that two people are meant to be together no matter what is as refreshing as the brilliant sea–scape that Murdock finally escapes to.

The production design is top–notch. Borrowing images and ideas from Metropolis, Kafka, Hollywood film noir, Blade Runner, "Star Trek," and Tim Burton, Proyas and Crow photographer Dariusz Wolski create a quasi–nightmarish, clausterphobic world straight out of modern day comics, or as fans call them, "graphic novels." Completing this feeling of clausterphobia is Sewell's portrayal of the confused hero, caught between "past" and present.

But despite how assured Proyas' direction is, some things in Dark City just don't make any sense — like why Connelly's memories aren't being played with when everyone falls asleep, why the Strangers number in the hundreds but only send four agents to the surface, and why Keifer Sutherland, in the movie's strangest role, keeps talking in staccato rhythms, speaking only three words at a time.

The movie digresses even more in a ridiculous finale, a special effects–based battle of wills that

DJ Self a hybrid of Cannibus & DMX

After a week hiatus, I'm back. Now, let's peep at what's been in my tape deck recently.

You remember those rookie cards that Topps used to put out: the ones featuring two new up and coming players (not those lame trophy cards that came out in the late eighties), well DJ Self just gave us the tape version. Self's new mix tape is a split between DMX and Cannibus, and these dogs are barking. Both DMX and Cannibus are coming at you hotter then a Nolan Ryan fastball with extra salsa on top.

I first noticed Cannibus on the new Lost Boyz album, I then noticed how he proceeded to catch more wreck then Redman and the Boyz on "Beasts from the East." Then he blew up on "Making a Name For Ourselves" with Common. That's the track where he warns that he'll make "Cannibus the name to fear." Like the gimp in Usual Suspects believed in God but feared Keiser Soze, you can believe in whoever you like but if you hold a microphone you should fear Cannibus. This tape showcases every track Cannibus has been on, as well as a couple of freestyles, and all I can say is he is the truth.

Adam Dlugacz

"Where my dogs at!" You know the refrain, so step and meet the man who brought it to you, DMX. DMX is so hungry, it's scary, and his voice will cause even the deaf to turn around and listen. Just like the A side of this tape we get every track DMX has been on. This tape is like a wake up call to all the veteran rappers, sleep on the youngsters and you'll get burned. Thanks to Self you know the rookies of the year, know and respect them. You can pick this tape up at the Grow Room in Amherst.

Next to bat we have local talent Big Phil, all I want to know is what rock have I been hiding under. This guy is enough to make me leave my beloved play station and venture from my apartment. This tape is a showcase for DJ Premier. To be honest I was hooked like a fatman at an IHOP buffet, when I heard "Firing Squad" by M.O.P.

This tape is incredible on two levels. First we have to give utmost respect to Premo, the best producer in hip–hop. It's astounding how many tracks this man has blessed, from Gang Starr to Jeru to Bahamadia, he turns and Elton John get caught in her crossfire.

Bernhard says the future is "open to whatever comes down the pipeline," but admits to wanting a weekly variety show like "Sonny & Cher" — with her own sardonic twist, of course.

Currently, Bernhard can be seen in the recently released An Alan Smithee Film: Burn Hollywood Burn, written by Showgirls writer/director Joe Eszterhas. While she is quick to point out that Burn Hollywood Burn is only "O.K.," she would jump at the chance to do one of Eszterhas' "hard-core films where I could be naughty." reduces the film to visual weirdness instead of more cerebral ideas. You know a scene is contrived when it's supposed to be serious but instead reminds you of the recent Barbara Streisand–Leonard Maltin battle on "South Park."

Dark City plays like a student film creation, only with a much bigger budget and some decent actors.

It draws heavily on other influences and the talents of a gifted visual artist.

Its weirdness shouldn't disappoint fans of the genre, but others will easily be turned off, even if it means missing a great visceral ride.

To watch Dark City is to succumb to the imagination of Proyas. To think about it, though, is a different matter. C+ everything to gold, Puff Daddy couldn't even stand in the same room as this man.

On the other level we have Big Phil, who simply has got the goods. The fact that he can do justice to Premier's works is a feat in itself and must be respected. Given, this tape doesn't have the production of a Tony Touch tape, but it will still blow your headphones off your lid. I'm not sure where you can get this, but it is worth searching for.

I have to say that both the DJ Self and the Big Phil tape are just another sign that real hip-hop is coming back. I think we're all sick of tracks rhyming about things most of the rappers have never done, over tracks from the eighties. With new rappers like Cannibus, DMX, Company Flow, and Big Punisher, we're seeing the return of MCs with skills rather than rappers with fancy cars.

It's even more refreshing to hear tracks that boast about microphone skills rather then how many people they've killed. Hip-hop is not about being a paper gangster, it is about a form of self representation. Watching KRS-One battle MC Shan or Kool Moe Dee battle Busy Bee showed a lot more talent and heart than Tupac and Biggie getting shot in the gutter. "What's his name told me you shot this kid last week in the park. That's a lie. You was in church with your moms" from OC. Let's give respect to the real MCs, DJs and Producers, not the cats with overactive imaginations who suffer from watching too many gangster flicks.

Quotes of the week:

• "And what they don't seem to understand is what New York created New York can also destroy" — Wallace Matthews

• "Big poodles scare me as much as midgets" — MC KB

• "I speak in frequencies dogs would have trouble hearing. .Cannibus is the lyrical version of German engineering...Raw metaphors that keep you high for months...Fly around the earth twice without refueling once...Ain't too many categories I can fit in when it comes to spitting because I'm overqualified for the position...The laser guided lyrical hybrid...Creating scripts so sick I have to arm wrestle my pen to write it...Cause if I ever catch one of you wannabe's biting we're going to be fist fighting" — Cannibus.

Former Dodger Butler questions Piazza's leadership

LOS ANGELES (AP) — While Mike Piazza may soon become baseball's first $100 million player, former teammate Brett Butler says his attitude leaves a lot to be desired.

"Mike Piazza is the greatest hitter I've ever been around... but you can't build around Piazza because he's not a leader," Butler was quoted as saying in yesterday's editions of the Los Angeles Times.

"You know all that stuff that went down last year about Mike being the leader, calling out the team, all that stuff?" Butler said. "It was all fabricated. Mike Piazza is a moody, self-centered '90s player."

Butler, who retired last year at age 40 after 16 big-league seasons, questioned Piazza's commitment.

"We're in [crunch] time during pennant races the last two years, and all Piazza seems to care about is winning the MVP from Larry Walker or the batting title from Tony Gwynn," Butler said. "We'd be winning games 8-0, but if he isn't getting his [hits], he'd be all ticked off, walking up and down the dugout all mad. Do you want to spend $100 million and build your team around that... or pay for a less-talented guy who is more of a leader?"

When Piazza heard what Butler had to say at the Dodgers' spring training headquarters in Vero Beach, Fla., he acknowledged disappointment.

"Brett obviously doesn't know me as well as he thinks he does," Piazza said. "You lead according to your personality. Guys can smell a fake. For me to be a rah-rah guy, that's not me. I lead other ways. Maybe Brett, who's never won a World Series, either, is very frustrated about something, and wants to make me a scapegoat. I always looked up to him, tried to learn from him, that's why this is so disappointing. We can't be concerned about what Brett Butler says about our club, because he's not on our club."

Coming off one of the finest offensive years by a catcher — a .362 batting average with 40 homers and 124 RBI — the 29-year-old Piazza will earn $8 million this season, completing a $15 million, two-year contract. He will be eligible for free agency following the season.

Rankings tell tale of gym quad–meet

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

The odds were against the No. 24 Massachusetts women's gymnastics team when it went down to Tuscaloosa, Ala. this past weekend. Pitted against three ranked opponents — all higher than the Minutewomen — coach Dave Kuzara knew he would need a tremendous team effort to pull off a victory.

In Saturday's quad–meet, everything went the way the polls said it would, as the Minutewomen placed fourth out of four teams, falling to No. 3 Alabama, No. 10 Arizona State and No. 23 North Carolina State.

Sophomore Mandy Mosby highlighted the meet by capturing the all–around crown with a season–high 38.825. The Georgia native placed fourth on the balance beam with a 9.800 and fifth on the floor exercise with a season–high 9.875.

"Mandy had a great meet winning the all–around," Kuzara said. "She really stepped it up a few levels when we needed her to."

Freshman Jill Fisher continued her success on the mat, registering a 9.975 in her floor routine, placing second in the event behind a perfect score from Arizona State's Elizabeth Reid. Fisher now holds the top four floor exercise scores on the season for the Minutewomen. She also placed fifth on the vault, posting a 9.725.

As a team, the Minutewomen (8–4) posted a season–high mark on the balance beam with a 47.975.

The weak link of the meet could have been on the uneven bars, as the Minutewomen's 47.350 was a full point behind all of its opponents. Freshman Mary Moore led all Minutewomen on the bars with a 9.625.

"We tried a few new things down there," Kuzara said. "Some of them worked, some of them didn't. It's a whole different world down there. You need to take chances against those kind of teams."

Alabama's only all–arounder, Robin Hawkins, won the vault with a 9.850, but tore her right anterior cruciate ligament during her floor routine, knocking her out of contention for the quad–meet title.

The Minutewomen are next in action on Saturday, March 7 at 5:30 p.m. as they take on cross–state rival Northeastern at the Curry Hicks Cage. Senior co–captains Penny LeBeau and Karen Maurer will anchor the team in their final home meets.

"It promises to be an emotional meet. In gymnastics, more than most sports, senior nights are really emotional because this is it for them," said Kuzara. "There aren't any pickup gymnastics meets after this."

rebounds, and blocks. Duncan was recently kicked out of the nest so to speak when Robinson had to sit out six games with an inflamed knee. Duncan then showed what he was really made out of when he led the Spurs to four wins in six games, basically serving as a one man wrecking crew.

Game of the Week: The Sonics visit a streaking Heat team tonight as the best in the West (and maybe the league) meet the hottest in the East. Gary Payton will try to put "The Glove" on guard Tim Hardaway and prevent him from dictating Seattle's defense. Sonic forward Vin Baker will have his hands full with Alonzo Mourning, one of the best centers in the league since the All–Star break.

Quote of the Week: "I'm tired of answering the same questions over and over. I'm thinking of not talking the rest of the season." — Houston forward Charles Barkley after the Rockets' 106–100 loss to the Utah Jazz on Sunday.

"The good teams not only compete well, but have good percentages in practice, and that comes with experience. Right now our percentages are much higher in the meets than at our practices."

UMass will next head down I–91 to square off once again with Springfield College.

"We will take it one step at a time the rest of the way," Johnson said. "We will be prepared for Springfield College."

UMass will face unfamiliar competition when they head out to face Cal–Berkeley and Stanford later in the month.

"If we continue to compete this well, we could surprise one of those teams out west," Johnson said. "We are looking forward for the chance to compete with them."

named the Atlantic 10 tournament's Most Outstanding Player. Kraft was also named to the All–Championship team, along with Tudman.

"It's a great, but I would give it back for another two or four points," Kraft said.

Despite the loss, O'Brien said that this team was the best she has ever coached.

"This team can look at themselves in a mirror and know that they gave their best effort, and that's all you want as a coach," she said. "As long as you've given everything you have to give, that's all you can ask for. The pride that I have is probably more now than it ever has been with this team."

Mitchell climbed to the top of the school assist charts this season, compiling 574. Tudman proved her worth in her second career double–double against Duquesne (in the conference tournament quarterfinals) with 10 points and 14 rebounds.

Last night's matchup was the culmination of a year's work for both teams. After going just 10–21 during their 1996–97 season, Virginia Tech almost flip–flopped its record in coach Bonnie Henrickson's rookie season. It marked the first time either team had been to the A–10 finals before. It also earmarked the introduction or the return of many players. Kraft returned after nearly two injury–prone seasons. Hokies' forward, Michelle Houseright, an All–Tournament selection, came back to basketball after a year–long hiatus she took for her marriage and the birth of her first child. Maria Albertsson, a native of Sweden, sat out last season as a transfer from Virginia Commonwealth University.

But the continuation of the season is still pending as UMass waits for a possible invitation to the NCAA tournament. Whether the Minutewomen are selected is no longer in their hands.

"We finally got things together the way we wanted the team working, we felt really good," Mitchell said. "I'm trying to stay positive. If it's between GW and UMass, I'm pretty sure we should get it."

UM track takes tough third place finish

By Paul Teves
Collegian Correspondent

Still riding high off its Atlantic 10 conference championship the previous Saturday, the Massachusetts women's track team headed to a tougher setting last weekend. The challenge looming for the Minutewomen was in the form of Connecticut and Northeastern, both of whom beat UMass earlier this season.

Despite valiant efforts from many of the veterans on the team, UMass finished third behind UConn (124 points) and Northeastern (123 points). The Minutewomen finished the meet with 72 points.

"We finished third in a very tough field, and we were coming off a very big win at the A–10s," Minutewoman coach Julie LaFreniere said. "Sometimes it's tough to follow up such an emotional victory with another incredible performance."

This meet wasn't really about the team scores, it was more about individual performances. It also gave several of the athletes one last chance to qualify for the ECAC championships.

Shelanda Irish was a highlight yet again. She went into the meet with a little knee trouble that has bothered her since the Valentine's Day Invitational. That injury was not an issue at this meet. She qualified for ECACs in the long jump, with a jump of 19–feet–1 1/4. She also finished fourth in the 55m dash with a time of 7.18, which is a new UMass, and facility, record.

She was also a big part of the 4x400m relay team which placed fifth overall.

"She has been a big part of our season and this meet was no exception," LaFreniere said. "Rosey Bryan also had a terrific weekend."

Bryan won the 55m hurdles in a meet and UMass record time (7.98). She also placed second in the triple jump with a jump of 39–feet–2 1/4. Bryan also contributed team points in the long jump, an event in which she placed fifth overall.

Other scorers for UMass included Silifa Kenku, who placed second in the 400m, and Anya Forrest, who placed fifth in the 55m hurdles.

Shannon Hamilton earned a fifth place finish in the 20 pound weight with a throw of 50 feet, 1 inch.

Nicole Way was also a big part of the meet. She is the New England Champion in the 1000m, and she also helped the distance medley team to a record run and a first place finish with a time of 12:01.27. This time was good enough for UMass to own the new facility record. The other members of that record–setting relay team were Rebecca Donaghue, Yves Amazan and Melissa Henderson.

UMass had another strong relay performance in the 4x800m where they finished fourth. Way, Melissa Henderson, Tracy Meagher and Christy Martin ran the race in a time of 9:28.34.

UMass will head to the ECAC Championships in Boston this weekend.

Hokies break UMass' heart with tourney title win

By Jackie Laroux
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team lost a heartbreaker to Virginia Tech last night. UMass fell 66-64 to the Hokies in overtime in the championship game of the Atlantic 10 tournament at the William D. Mullins Center.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Senior co-captain Kara Tudman was named to the Atlantic 10 All-Tournament team.

The Minutewomen had found themselves down by seven with 5:50 remaining in regulation and managed to come back and hold on to force the overtime. UMass scored the first basket in overtime with a jumper from senior forward Kara Tudman. Junior Michelle Houseright tied the game up again at 60 for the Hokies with a jumper of her own at the 2:55 mark.

Despite several attempts by the Minutewomen to hit some big shots, they were unable to take back the lead. Sophomore guard Alison MacFarland found herself at the line shooting a one-and-one with 2:45 remaining, but was unable to convert. Junior guard Katie O'Connor followed the missed free throw with a layup to give the Hokies the lead. With 1:48 remaining freshman forward Tere Williams nailed a layup to put Virginia Tech ahead by four.

A free throw apiece from freshman guard Kathy Coyner and senior guard Sabriya Mitchell pulled the Minutewomen within a basket. The Minutewomen were able to force a Hokie turnover, and with less than five seconds to go junior forward Tez Kraft found herself in the lane and with the ball in her hands. She quickly threw up a shot, but it bounced off the rim and was rebounded by the Hokies. Kraft fouled freshman guard Amy Wetzel in the hopes of attaining another UMass possession. But the Minutewomen were over the foul limit, and Wetzel took advantage, hitting both free throws. MacFarland hit a jumper for UMass at the buzzer, but it was only enough to cut Virginia Tech's final lead to two points.

"Both teams played with absolutely everything they had, and they just happened to make one more good play than we did," UMass coach Joanie O'Brien said. "They were able to come up with something at the end. We had our opportunities and just weren't able to take advantage of them."

The game was a close one for the entire contest. The score was tied eight times. UMass' biggest lead of the game was a nine-point advantage at halftime. The Minutewomen were down by as many as seven at the 15:43 mark in the first half, but ended the half on an 11-2 run to take over.

The Hokies came out strong to begin the second half, and took the lead with 8:34 left to play. After watching Virginia Tech pull ahead for most of the half, the Minutewomen came back off of strong plays from Kraft and Coyner.

A jumper from Kraft pulled UMass within two, and a three from Coyner gave the Minutewomen a one point lead at the 3:13 mark. Both teams remained scoreless until Wetzel hit one of two free throw attempts to tie things up again and send the game into overtime.

With the win the Hokies earned an automatic bid into the NCAA tournament. The Minutewomen still have a chance to earn an at-large bid when berths are announced during Sunday's selection show.

"Joanie and her kids deserve to go, they are very, very talented," Virginia Tech coach Bonnie Henrickson said. "It would be a shame if they don't."

Kraft finished the game with a double-double, pulling down 11 rebounds and scoring 19. For her stellar play throughout the tournament she was

NCAA tournament? UM makes its case

All that's left to do is wait and hope.

The Massachusetts women's basketball team lost 66-64 last night in overtime against a relentless Virginia Tech team in the Atlantic 10 tournament final at the William D. Mullins Center. With the victory, the Hokies earned an automatic bid to the NCAA tournament.

The Minutewomen (18-10, 11-6 A-10) now have to hold their collective breath and pray the selection committee chooses them for the field of 64. They have only advanced to the "big dance" once before in school history, during the 1995-96 season.

But UMass brings a lot to the table in its quest for a bid, especially when stacked up against the other most eligible A-10 team, George Washington, which attended last year's tournament.

The Colonials, the regular season champ in the A-10 West, are led by the "Spanish Connection" of Elisa Aguilar (A-10 All-Tournament and second team All Conference) and Noelia Gomez (first team All-Conference). GW finished off its season at 19-9 with a loss to Virginia Tech in the tourney semi-finals.

The Minutewomen hold a 1-0 advantage over GW, defeating them 68-55 on Feb. 19. UMass finished up its regular season winning every game in the month of February, including a nine-game winning streak to clinch second place in the A-10 east division.

Besides the team accolades, Sabriya Mitchell received second team All-Conference honors and Tez Kraft was awarded a place on the third team All-Conference for the regular season. Kraft was also honored as an A-10 All-Tournament pick as well as earning the tournament's Most Outstanding Player. Senior Kara Tudman joined Kraft as an All-Tournament selection.

But personal achievements aside, the Minutewomen opened a lot of eyes as they battled through the season. After the loss of pre-season second team All-Conference pick Kelly Van Huisen to an ACL injury and the delayed return of Kraft from injury, UMass was left to fend for itself without its two main floor leaders.

Coach Joanie O'Brien had dealt with the loss of players before and instilled in her team that it could, and would, go on.

"This team scrapped all year long," O'Brien said. "An awful lot of kids stepped it up, and they played as well as they probably could have."

One of this year's pleasant surprises was the influx of freshman Kathy Coyner, who tallied a career-high 22 points in the Feb. 19 contest against the Colonials. Sophomore Alison MacFarland has been the consistent spark, creating much of her own offense off the drive. Junior Yolanda Rayside is considered one of the most improved players in the A-10 this year as she poured in 19 points at Temple and raked in 13 rebounds at St. Bonaventure last weekend.

The senior co-captain tandem of Mitchell, a fifth-year player, and Tudman has not been outclassed by its underclassmen counterparts.

Men's gymnastics clinches NE champs

The Massachusetts men's gymnastics team captured the New England championship crown this weekend at Curry Hicks Cage.

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's gymnastics team turned in a supreme effort to capture the New England Championships on Saturday at the Curry Hicks Cage. UMass ran away with the prestigious event by totaling a school record of 228.1 points, besting their previous high of 227.450 set against Temple last February.

UMass placed well ahead of runner-up Springfield College who managed a mere 205.35.

"This is the type of output I have been looking for from this team," coach Roy Johnson said. "We needed to take this event, to show what we were capable of."

There were many individual highlights for UMass on Saturday. Stephen Pryor set a school record for overall total with 57.65, shattering the previous high set by current UMass gymnast Jeff LaValle (57.60). Pryor earned a 9.8 on both pommel horse and horizontal bars to highlight his performance.

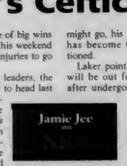
"Pryor was excellent for us," Johnson said. "He earned the record for himself and he really helped the team."

The pommel horse proved to be an all around success for for the Minutemen.

Andy Leis actually topped Pryor's score with a 9.85. After Pryor, David Surgent gained a 9.65, and Brad LeClair chipped in with a 9.55.

The horizontal bars were another breakthrough event for UMass. Phil Lieberman placed second for the Minutemen with a 9.65, which was a season-high for him. Andy Leis added a 9.5.

Coach Johnson has been pleased with the results from freshmen like Leis and J.J. Hershey this year.



"Our younger guys have given us huge contributions all year but the key to continuing success for us will be improving our performances in practice," Johnson said.

Anderson helping Pitino's Celtics gel

The NBA had its share of big wins and even bigger defeats this weekend with enough upsets and injuries to go around.

In a battle of division leaders, the Heat and Jazz went head to head last Tuesday with Miami nipping Utah, 104-102. The Heat go into this week's action with momentum to spare as they're currently riding a ten-game winning streak, preserved by Voshon Lenard. In Sunday's game against the Nets, he hit two key free throws to give Miami an 85-84 victory.

Jamie Jee

The following night saw another marquee matchup, this time between the Lakers and Pacers. With each team in second place in their respective divisions, Indiana did not play its best defense and L.A.'s golden boys went on the offensive to secure a 96-89 victory, keeping them in sight of the front-running Sonics.

The Pacers would eventually get back into the swing of things however, as they pasted the Blazers 124-59, marking the first time in the NBA's 51-year history that one team has doubled its opponent's point total.

Portland may have been riding on the laurels of their Wednesday night edging of the Bulls because they probably would not have shown up had they expected to lay so many bricks. That loss gave the Blazers second place on the all-time worst losses list. The Miami Heat lost by an amazing 68 points to the Cleveland Cavaliers in 1991.

It was a pretty good week for Pacer head coach Larry Bird. In addition to leading Indiana to its largest margin of victory and fewest points allowed in a game ever, Boston saw his friends in green win three in a row.

The Celtics seem to be gelling under the leadership of point guard Kenny Anderson who came over in the trade for Boston's first-round draft pick in last summer's draft, Chauncey Billups. While head coach Rick Pitino has been both criticized and applauded, the trade has certainly seemed to improve the team thus far as Anderson is getting the ball to his teammates — most notably Antoine Walker and Ron Mercer — quickly and more effectively.

The seven-footer's path to that kind of potential has certainly looked promising thus far. Recent winner of his fourth-straight Rookie of the Month award, Duncan has also had the golden opportunity to learn from and play with the best, in center David Robinson.

While Robinson has taken the former Demon Deacon under his wing this season, Duncan's game has quickly blotsomed into that of the highest NBA caliber. Already among the league leaders in points, might go, his old team in California has become the most often mentioned.

Laker point guard Nick Van Exel will be out for about three weeks after undergoing arthroscopic knee surgery on Thursday. Van Exel, the league's best in turnover-to-assist ratio, has been missed, but reserve guard Derek Fisher has filled the shoes left for him well.

Chicago Bull Scottie Pippen would like to end up on his own Western Conference team after the predicted disassembling of one of the best teams of all time. Joining him may be rebounding leader Dennis Rodman who is just "floating" right now. Pippen's style of play could fit right in with the wider, more open type of game played in the West.

Those decisions are much easier if Chicago wins another championship and Michael Jordan is satisfied enough to start working on his golf game. If the Bulls don't win, its hard to think that Jordan would consider that he was still "leaving while on top." More likely than not, however, that won't matter because when it comes down to it, most will find it difficult to send His Airness to the links before he feels like it.

If Jordan does decide to end his basketball days at the end of this year, that would leave to game to the youth of the league. There has been talk of Kobe Bryant possibly being on that list as he has prematurely been compared to Jordan. The Pale Rider himself, Keith Van Horn, has also received praise in the form of possibly aspiring to Larry Legend status one day, again, very prematurely.

Then there's San Antonio's Tim Duncan. Not many have likened the rookie All-Star center to any one player, but then again, the great ones are usually the originators of such comparisons.

The seven-footer's path to that kind of potential has certainly looked promising thus far. Recent winner of his fourth-straight Rookie of the Month award, Duncan has also had the golden opportunity to learn from and play with the best, in center David Robinson.

While Robinson has taken the former Demon Deacon under his wing this season, Duncan's game has quickly blotsomed into that of the highest NBA caliber. Already among the league leaders in points,

Men's track claims fourth at New Englands

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's indoor track team had never finished higher than third at the Atlantic 10 championships. One week after they finished fifth at this year's A-10s, the Minutemen claimed fourth place overall at an even bigger meet, the New England Regional Championships.

"As a team we finished fourth," senior sprinter Scott Price said. "That's the best we've finished since I've been here. That's a definite positive."

Price was a major factor in the strong team showing this past weekend, as he dominated the short distance sprints like never before. Even in a season in which setting school records was a seemingly weekly occurance, the senior's individual performances were captivating and unequaled.

"I was really happy with my performances," Price said. "I ran my best in the 55m. I crushed the New England record in the 200m with 21.46. There was a fast guy in the fourth lane, and there was a fast guy in lane two. I just went as fast as I could."

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Ben Baraldi won the high hurdles at the New England championships this weekend.

His time in the 55m, 6.41 seconds, also tied his own school record. The sprinter, who is quickly becoming a Massachusetts track legend with his string of broken school marks, won both events in his indoor regional championships. His 4x400m relay team captured the UMass record for a second time this year, while placing second overall in that event behind the eventual team champion, Connecticut.

Price did not stand alone in the Minuteman spotlight, however.

"Ben Baraldi did real well in the high hurdles," Price said. "He took first in that event."

Baraldi tied his IC4A qualifying season's best time of 7.70 seconds in the 55-meter hurdles. The junior has been placing highly all year long.

Conference champion pole vaulter Albie Vasquez tied his own school record of 14-feet-9-inches in a fifth place effort. "Some of the individuals did well, but it was all better because UMass was doing well as a team," Price said.

In fact, the team's fourth place ranking was easily the highest in recent history. The Minutemen were only eight points behind third place Rhode Island, which beat UMass by twenty points only one week ago. New Hampshire, which UMass defeated on Dec. 6, continued in its late season mastery of the Minutemen by pulling in second place overall.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Scott Price destroyed the old New England record for the 200m dash this weekend.

On March 7, the qualifying Massachusetts competitors will travel to Ithaca, N.Y. for the IC4A Championships. Ryan Carrara will go in the mile and 3000m. Dave Cahill qualified in the 500m. Tom Toye, Marc Sylvander and Neil Concepcion will represent UMass in the 400m, Price will join Toye in the 200m and 55m dashes, and all three relay teams will make the trip to New York as well.

Daniel Ortega accused of sex abuse in letter

MANAGUA, Nicaragua (AP) — In a public letter that surprised the nation yesterday, Daniel Ortega's stepdaughter accused the former Nicaraguan president of sexual abuse that she said began when she was 11 and lasted for years.

Ortega said the accusations were causing him great pain, and his wife said they were false.

"We want to treat this as a family matter," Rosario Murillo said at a news conference, standing next to her husband.

The accusation, published in a newsletter and read over radio and television stations, caused an immediate commotion. Dozens of people called into the country's main radio station to express their shock.

The stepdaughter, Zoilamerica, 30, is Murillo's child from a previous marriage, and Ortega adopted her. Although she has always used the last name Ortega, she said in her letter that she would now take the name of her biological father, Jorge Narvaez, who is dead.

Citadel disputes Justice Dept. memo

CHARLESTON, S.C. (AP) — The president of the Citadel took exception yesterday to a U.S. Justice Department memo that said hazing exists to a "disturbing degree" at the state military school.

The Aug. 13 memo outlines the investigation into the 1996 hazing of two female cadets and describes how other cadets carved letters into a male cadet's chest, punched staples into another's and cut another cadet's face with a sword.

The memo said "hazing, including physical abuse, still exists to a disturbing degree" at The Citadel.

"Mistreating people because of legitimate injury or illness... unfortunately seems to be the way of life at The Citadel," said the memo obtained by The Charlotte (N.C.) Observer under the Freedom of Information Act.

"I can't say that applies today," said the school's president, John Grinalds, who became president in August and immediately took steps to crack down on hazing. "Hazing is not commonplace." Grinalds' changes included putting more adults in the barracks, rewriting college rules and stressing a philosophy that leading people does not mean abusing them.

SGA candidates debate campus issues

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Candidates for Student Government Association (SGA) student trustee and president made calls to action and promises of change to a handful of audience members at a debate yesterday afternoon.

Aside from the campaign rhetoric promising to get the job done and calls for change, the candidates discussed issues including affirmative action and what students really care about, but had little to say concerning what the jobs they are running for entail.

Current SGA President Lia Wong got five responses when she asked candidates to describe the responsibilities of the positions they were running for.

"It's a very simple question. I was wondering what your view of the responsibilities are. What do you do as president and trustee?" Wong asked.

Senator Jenn Casasanto (Southwest At-Large) felt the President is an advocate for students.

"Oftentimes you're going to committees and you're speaking for the entire student body," Casasanto said.

Salwa Shamapande described the time commitment involved with being the SGA president.

"If you're president please don't expect to take 12 credits. Be prepared to miss class. The administration doesn't take class schedules into account," Shamapande said.

Student Representative to the Board of Higher Education Eleanor Court described student trustee as a "two-tiered" job.

"My perception is that it is a two-tiered position. You keep in contact with the area governments and represent system- wide issues. Also, you have to work with administration and campus leadership," Court said.

Senator Eric Magaziu, (Southwest At-Large) stressed supporting students as important to being student trustee.

"I would always stick up for students. The administration is secondary," Magaziu said.

A question from a student concerning their stances on affirmative action prompted many candidates to speak.

Casasanto said she would fight to maintain diversity on campus.

"I think the [Asian Latino African Native American] caucus does a tremendous amount for the student body. They do real work... I'll stand up and fight for the goal [of 20 percent ALANA students on campus]," Casasanto said.

Senator Jeffrey Howe (Orchard Hill, Dickinson) felt the program to have ALANA students make up 20 percent of the student body should work more on recruitment and retention.

"I'm opposed to the idea of racial quotas. I think our program should be aimed at recruitment and retention."

UPC refuses outside vendor's offer to fund Spring Concert

By Marty Keane & Victoria Groves
Collegian Staff

For the second time in three years, University Productions & Concerts (UPC) has announced that there will be no Spring Concert at the University of Massachusetts.

In an advertisement taken out in last Wednesday's Massachusetts Daily Collegian, UPC credits the loss of membership and funds as the primary causes for the cancellation.

"We do not have the staff, the funds or the support necessary to put together an adequate Spring Concert," the advertisement read.

"UPC has been struggling for many years now," said Judy Gagnon, assistant director of the Campus Activities Advising Center.

"With the onset of MTV and VH-1, once a band's video airs, their price [to play a concert] skyrockets," Gagnon said.

According to Gagnon, last year's Spring Concert "cost [UPC] roughly $70,000." The costs were underwritten from student activities fees disbursed by the Student Government Association. For the first time in the show's history, students were required to pay a $2 admission fee.

"Student activity fees come from students' tuition and it would be a mistake for UPC to use their budget to work with an outside promoter who wants to make a profit," Gagnon said. "Besides, UPC has the ability to book these shows themselves."

John Peters, the head of Amherst-based concert promoter MassConcerts, is frustrated by UPC's decision to cancel Spring Concert without first asking for assistance.

Peters said that he could put together a bill featuring the Mighty Mighty Bosstones, A Tribe Called Quest, Ben Harper and Burning Spear for this year's Spring Concert and is willing to pay the estimated $70,000 for the talent and guarantee the event be free for all UMass students.

Peters said he is eager to work with Campus Activities and UPC to help bring concerts to the UMass community.

"To be honest, I'd prefer to put shows on at UMass because of the large, diverse student body," Peters said.

Because of Campus Activities unwillingness to allow UPC to work with outside promoters, Peters has been forced to book shows like Sonic Youth and Bob Dylan at other area colleges, including Mount Holyoke and Smith.

According to Delphine Quarles, director of Campus Activities Advising, there was a consensus reached between university administrators in the Campus Activities office, along with SGA and the UPC membership to cancel this year's Spring Concert.

"The decision to cancel the event was made by UPC and the Campus Activities Office in consultation with the SGA," Quarles said.

Peter Kilbourne, speaker of the SGA Senate, said he, along with the Senate body, had no knowledge of any meetings that took place that eventually led to the decision.

"I had no knowledge of any meetings taking place. I disagree [that the SGA was consulted]. The Senate wasn't aware of it and I wasn't either. To say it was a collective decision is not true," Kilbourne said.

Native Americans file civil rights law suit

By William Kates
Associated Press

SYRACUSE, N.Y. — State police invaded the Onondaga Nation territory and brutally attacked a group of peaceful protesters and religious celebrants, a group of Native Americans claimed in a $40 million civil rights lawsuit filed yesterday.

The group accused state troopers and local deputies of violating their constitutional rights to free speech and free assembly. The lawsuit filed in U.S. District Court named New York State Police Superintendent James W. McMahon, Onondaga County Sheriff Kevin Walsh and 48 troopers and deputies who took part in quelling the disturbance last spring on the Onondaga Nation just south of Syracuse.

The 48-page complaint also sought individual punitive damages from McMahon, Walsh and the others.

"The brutality and the excessive force was of such a nature that we think the federal courts is the right place for their rights to be remedied," said Elkan Abramowitz, an attorney representing some of the 91 plaintiffs in the lawsuit.

The lawsuit accused state police of operating a select "Indian detail... to employ riot squad tactics against Native Americans." The University senior announces candidacy for Amherst election

By Victoria Groves
Collegian Staff

Jason Vecchio, Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) student coordinator, has announced his candidacy for the April 7 Amherst Select Board election by means of a sticker campaign.

A senior political science and social thought and political economy (STPEC) major at the University of Massachusetts, Vecchio is counting on members of the campus community to help him in campaigning and getting students out to vote in general.

Currently, fundraising is underway to underride the cost of five to ten thousand stickers and other campaign materials. The stickers will be handed out at polling places and other areas around Amherst and voters can then affix them to their ballot in the write-in space.

"The way the sticker campaign will work is that I will have people working at all the polling places. There will be a lot of students, SGA [Student Government Association] leaders past and present, friends... anyone I've had experience with and might be interested in helping me out and giving me a few hours," Vecchio said.

No candidates who will appear on the ballot are students at the University.

Vecchio announced his candidacy at last week's SGA meeting and called upon members for support.

"I believe that to run a successful sticker campaign I will need a huge number of people to come out... I'm a student with limited resources in terms of funds but I have unlimited access to supporters," Vecchio said.

Former Amherst Select Board Member H. Oldham Brooks is positive about the need for a student member on the board, but is concerned about the odds Vecchio faces as a write in candidate.

"It's a shame that he won't be on the ballot, but I think he

Fundraising event to be held at Newman Center

Need a date?

Buy a fraternity brother or sorority sister at a fundraising charity auction, tomorrow Newman Center from 7-9:30 p.m.

The event is being sponsored by fraternity Sigma Alpha Mu and sororities Sigma Kappa and Kappa Kappa Gamma. Money raised from the event will go towards charities that the fraternity and sororities chose: the National Pediatric Aids Foundation, Alzheimer's Disease Research and the Big Brothers/Big Sisters Association.

A minimum bid of $5 is required to buy a date, and cash, check or money orders will be accepted.

On March 25, a date party at Club Kai will be held for all those auction participants who bought a date.

Senior political science and Bachelor's Degree with Individual Concentration (BDIC) major Jason Hill is coordinating the event. He said this is the third year that the event has been held, and it is expected to be one of the most successful.

"We're selling ourselves to have fun, and raise money for worthy causes," Hill said. "I'm expecting a really good turnout. We should have about 75 participants."

Hill said they are thinking about selling couple's tickets to the party at Club Kai. He said they also may sell tickets at the door.

– Jason Hill

Rachel Smith, house treasurer of Sigma Kappa, and a sophomore computer science major, said this is her first semester in a sorority, and she is excited about the first big event.

"I'm looking forward to it," Smith said. "It's helping to get the houses together, and increases Greek area social life," she said.

Smith said the auction is a good way to show some of the positive events the Greek area sponsors. Smith explained as part of the national chapter, Sigma Kappa is required to perform charity work. Other fraternities and sororities are also required to do the same.

The auction is open to all students of the University, not just students involved with fraternities or sororities. Both Hill and Smith said it is a good cause and will also be a lot of fun.

Scientists successfully alter liver gene in rats

By Malcolm Ritter
Associated Press

NEW YORK — In an astonishing result, scientists altered a gene in rats' livers by injecting a "repairman" molecule into the animals' bloodstreams. The technique might lead to a cure someday for hemophilia and some other inherited diseases in people.

The startling thing was how well it worked. The treatment produced a specific change in about 40 percent of the rat liver's supply of the targeted gene. Other techniques have achieved rates more like one in a million, even when tried on cells in laboratory dishes rather than in an animal.

A 40 percent success rate could cure many genetic diseases. But gene therapy experts cautioned that it's not clear whether this technique would apply to a range of disorders. They also noted that many scientists have not been able to make it work.

If the technique works in people, it might cure an inherited form of high cholesterol that affects about one in 500 people and gives them heart attacks around age 40. Other liver targets, apart from hemophilia, are mostly rare diseases. But with modification, the technique might also treat some other genetic diseases outside the liver.

"We were surprised ourselves by how efficient it was," said Dr. Clifford I. Steer of the University of Minnesota, who reports the work with colleagues in the March issue of the journal Nature Medicine.

Most gene therapy experiments haven't tried to fix a bad gene. Instead, they've supplied cells with working copies of a gene to step in for the defective version. Fixing the bad gene would be better, but the low efficiency in past experiments has been discouraging.

To show that the technique works, Steer's rat study used the technique to alter a healthy gene rather than correcting a bad one. But researchers now plan a study in dogs to fix a flawed gene that causes hemophilia, he said.

The repairman molecule had two main parts. One was a tag to make liver cells grab the repairman when it passed by in the blood. The other part contained a mix of DNA and its chemical cousin RNA, designed to seek out a particular piece of the gene for a clotting substance called factor IX.

Once the repairman showed up there, the cells replaced that piece of gene with the substitute brought by the repairman. How that works is still a bit of a mystery, but it probably involves the body's natural mechanism for repairing genetic flaws, Steer said.

Dr. James M. Wilson, a gene therapy expert at the University of Pennsylvania, said a big question is how well the technique would work against a variety of genetic flaws. "If it's not generic, and it only functions in a subset of patients with rare diseases, it's not going to have the kind of impact that gene therapy needs to have," he said.

ought to [run] because he will put issues on the table," Brooks said.

A positive impact that Brooks foresees should Vecchio be elected is an improvement in Amherst and University relations.

"Any dialog always helps between two parties and I think a student on the board would certainly be beneficial," Brooks said.

Although Vecchio is a senior, he will be at the University completing his studies for another semester and also plans to live in the Amherst area after graduation.

"I love Amherst... it's a place I'd like to live. I decided there needed to be a stronger bridge between the student body and the town of Amherst," Vecchio said.

"Being on the board I would like to serve as a mediator between the two groups and build a better environment. There's a real need for that."

Vecchio is in favor of the proposed parking garage in Amherst center and also a proposal to turn the Amherst Cinema into a center for the arts.

"I think it's a great idea. It's a great opportunity [for Amherst] to practice its arts independently. I think the community should support it," Vecchio said.

The perception of the town towards having a student on the board is what Vecchio feels to be his biggest obstacle.

"My biggest obstacle is dealing with the perception of the town residents. that a student would be a responsible town leader. Some people are very hesitant. If they gave me the opportunity to convince them I think I could be very successful," Vecchio said.

■ spring concert

SGA President Lia Wong did attend UPC meetings to discuss the Spring Concert and supports its cancellation because of UPC's low budget and declining member interest despite MassConcerts offer to co-present the concert at no extra cost to students.

"[UPC] can't put one together. I would much rather have a well-organized organization than to promise the student body something that they can't produce," Wong said.

"This is the first I've heard of a particular outside group wanting to organize Spring Concert, but I endorse [UPC's] decision. It's not that I don't want a Spring Concert, but they can't organize one."

Currently, there is nothing in the SGA by-laws that would prevent an outside organization from coming onto campus and co-sponsoring such an event.

Undergraduate Martin Clinton sees no problem with having an outside vendor organizing Spring Concert if it would bring in bigger talent and no additional cost to students.

"I think it's pathetic that there are no big names at Spring Concert. As far as an outside vendor, I have no problem with it. It would bring someone better and be good name recognition for our school," Clinton said.

Melee erupts over prime minister vote

By Paul Shin
Associated Press

SEOUL, South Korea — A crucial vote on President Kim Dae-jung's choice for prime minister ended in a melee Monday as members of Parliament scuffled over voting methods.

The dispute over the nomination has cast doubt on the new president's ability to implement the economic and political reforms he has promised to mend the nation's shattered economy.

Chaos ensued on the floor of the single-chamber legislature as rival members shouted protests and insults. Brief shoving matches broke out. No injuries were reported.

Twenty minutes into the voting, Speaker Kim Soo-hwan adjourned the session after legislators of the president's party angrily protested what they claimed were illegal votes by opposition members.

"They are casting blank votes, illegal votes," one legislator from the president's party shouted as his colleagues blocked opposition members from casting ballots.

The uproar was broadcast live on national television.

The opposition controls 161 seats in the 294-seat National Assembly, giving it 13 votes more than needed to reject the nomination.

According to MBC-TV, the opposition party ordered its members to cast blank ballots as a show of solidarity against the nomination of Kim Jong-pil, 72.

It claimed Kim Jong-pil is not qualified to serve as prime minister because of his ties to past military dictatorships and his lack of background in economics.

The opposition party boycotted Parliament last week, preventing a quorum from voting on the nomination, which President Kim announced immediately after his inauguration.

The boycott forced the new president to work with the outgoing Cabinet. He has been unable to name his own team because, by law, the prime minister must recommend Cabinet members before the president appoints them.

President Kim says if Parliament fails to vote on the nomination, he will appoint Kim Jong-pil as acting prime minister and then name a new Cabinet.

The opposition party contends that the appointment of an acting prime minister would be unconstitutional.

troopers' unprovoked attack on the protesters was intended as "a payback" for an earlier confrontation between the state police and the Cattaraugus Senecas, the lawsuit charged.

After reviewing the lawsuit, state police were standing by their earlier conclusion that the troopers acted properly, spokeswoman Lt. Jamie Mills said. "We stand by our report."

The lawsuit came just a day after Onondaga chiefs had four reservation smoke shops bulldozed and burned because they were illegally operating without tribal permits.

It was the chiefs who invited state police onto the reservation May 18, 1997, when a quiet protest over a temporary tax agreement with the state turned violent and 15 Indians and five state troopers were injured. State police said they were trying to stop the protesters from blocking a nearby interstate highway.

The scuffle was caught on videotape and aired on television news broadcasts across the state. Despite the striking footage, an internal investigation by state police determined troopers acted properly, a finding that only angered the Native Americans involved.

Two dozen protesters were arrested in the incident. However, a local judge, citing a lack of probable cause for the arrests, later dismissed the charges against all but one of the protesters.

"I don't think the lawsuit is high enough," said Kenneth Kappelmeier, the lone remaining defendant in that case and one of the lawsuit's plaintiffs.

"I think each one of us deserves at least $25 million. I think it's about time that New York State pay for what they've been doing to us," said Kappelmeier, whose felony assault case is up today when a county judge will decide whether to dismiss it or set a trial date.

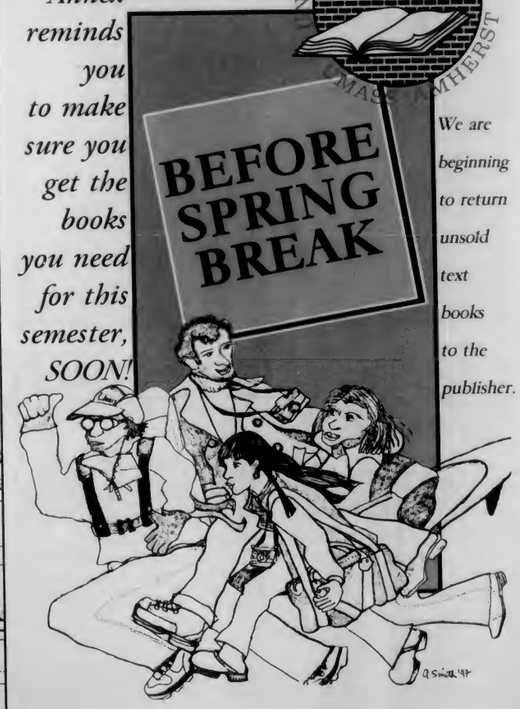
The lawsuit contended that state police intruded on a peaceful gathering of Onondaga people being held on private property. Abramowitz said some of those attending were there to protest the actions taken by their chiefs while others were participating in a religious ceremony and community dinner.

"Without giving any warning... and without any explanation or justification for their actions, state police moved in on the unarmed plaintiffs, and with nightsticks drawn, punched, kicked, beat and arrested many plaintiffs," the lawsuit said. "The arrests were especially brutal, and were carried out with excessive force."

Abramowitz accused troopers of carrying out "an organized and retaliatory response" against the Onondaga protesters because of the civil unrest a month earlier on the Seneca territory in Bryant, N.Y. More than a dozen troopers were injured during a clash with the Senecas that closed down a 30-mile section of the New York Thruway for several days.

Like the Onondagas, some Senecas were angry over a temporary agreement with the state over taxes on gas and cigarettes sold to non-Indians. Gov. George Pataki has since proposed doing away with those tax collections.

In response to the disturbance on the Seneca Nation, the state police formed an "Indian detail" to deal with future situations involving Native American tribes, Abramowitz said.



However, the group was "not sufficiently trained in non-violent crowd control methods... nor was it sufficiently trained in the use of force and the procedure to be used in effecting arrests," the lawsuit said.

The Indian detail "was designed and intended to disrupt acts of political expression by Native Americans using aggressive riot-squad tactics (and) constitutes an invidious discriminatory practice against Native Americans," the lawsuit charged.

Advertising heaven

Advertising, whether blatant or subtle, permeates all aspects of modern day life. Advertisers choose various mediums to carry messages to the public, whether it be through television, radio, billboards and more recently, the movies. Promoting products within the movies or tying promotional campaigns to a movie release is the latest trend advertisers are taking advantage of.

Seema Gankatirkar

Product placement within the movies can be as subtle as a Coke can on a table or the blatant glow of a neon Budweiser sign. While some may argue that putting brands within the movies adds to an element of realism, viewers are taking notice of the brands advertised within films.

The James Bond film, Goldeneye, demonstrates the influence product placement in the films has on consumer awareness. Sales of the Z3, which made a cameo appearance in the film, took off when 007 traded his traditional Aston Martin for the BMW.

Product plugging through the movies is a win-win situation for both movie studios and advertising agencies. For marketers, the movies provide access to two hard-to- reach audiences: foreign viewers and young people.

Face it, when you are in a movie theater, you are a "captive" audience. Product placement in the movies means advertisers exasperated with channel surfing have finally found their niche where viewers watch every moment. Unlike television, movie viewers do not get up and grab a snack or take a trip to the bathroom to avoid the commercials.

As a result, advertisers try their best to clutter the movies with products, trying to attract the attention of consumers, in the hopes that the audience will buy. And when it comes to stuffing the movies with products and slogans, no consumer stands a chance in the face of the Madison Avenue- Hollywood alliance.

Take Sylvester Stallone, for instance. The tough guy wins hands down for cluttering up his films with various products. His movie Rocky III promotes Coca-Cola, Sanyo, Nike, Wheaties, TWA, Marantz, Wurlitzer, Nikon, Harley-Davidson, Budweiser, Masterati, Gatorade and American Express.

So while the advertising agencies are fixated on sell, sell, sell, Hollywood isn't hurting much from the trend of product placement.

First, a partnership with a strong mass marketer can turn a film into a virtual brand, allowing producers to live off the merchandising deals. You only have to swing into the nearest fast food franchise to see that movie producers are pushing tie-ins like Little Mermaid dolls fast into the marketplace.

Making movies isn't cheap, as the blockbuster Titanic demonstrates. Titanic cost an estimated $200 million to produce, and even though the James Cameron film is one of the highest grossing movies of all time, other big budget films aren't as lucky.

The branding of a movie can protect against failure at the box office. By teaming up with advertisers, studios can defray the high cost of filmmaking by providing not only props, but also costumes and tie-in promotional campaign.

For example, in return for the plug for its Power Book in Mission: Impossible, Apple promoted the movie in an estimated $15 million campaign and also created the website devoted to the film.

Product placement interferes with movie making by taking control of the film away from the studios and placing advertisers in charge. Goldeneye provides a good example of how a studio bows to its advertising partner. MGM/UA wrote in an entire scene revolving around Bond's new BMW.

Another movie, Flipper, added $40,000 to its production costs when the producers of the film signed a marketing deal with PepsiCo. Following the deal, computer graphics changed a Coke can into a Pepsi can in an otherwise perfect scene.

Within the film, the products upstage the actors. In Always, Holly Hunter fades into the background, while a can of Pepsi claims the brightest spot in the scene. In Uncle Buck, John Candy plays second fiddle to a box of Kellogg's Frosted Flakes. Helen Hunt shared her film debut in Twister with Chrysler Corp.'s Dodge Ram and the Whoopie Goldberg movie, Eddie, featured New York Knicks uniforms, courtesy of a deal with the National Basketball Association.

But, for those of you fretting that Hollywood is selling out to the advertisers, keep in mind that putting a product into a movie doesn't necessarily signal success. For example, the Sony Mini-disc CD player appeared prominently in the box office bomb, Last Action Hero, yet sales of the product did not improve. Many viewers felt that the Arnold Schwarzenegger film resembled a very long commercial.

In the struggle to pay the mounting costs of filmmaking and capture consumers' flagging attention, Hollywood has formed an unholy alliance. In the process of product plugging, film quality suffers — but the real losers are the viewers. Shameless advertising allows talented actors to co-star with Coke cans and Cheetos.

Realism or not, chances are you're still plopping down $7 to watch a really long, if not subtle, commercial. The next big star might not be Leonardo DiCaprio or Claire Danes; it could be Budweiser.

Sinking standards

Monica Lewinsky, you must settle for second place and like it.

As I see it, she's only numero deux on the list of high- profile media circuses about going down this year — Titanic is king, and frankly I don't get it. You turn on the nightly news and the financial report for the day features the Dow Jones, silver, gold and Titanic. The film has grossed in excess of 70 mamagillion clams in domestic box offices alone. By year's end we should have currency from the Franklin Mint bearing the visages of Rose, Jack, Molly Brown and even the swarthy third-class passengers.

I don't get it.

By most critical standards, this epic is one of the top five American films of the year, but would be hard pressed to make the cut across the board for the elite five if you include international efforts. Yet people are flocking to see it after 11 weeks of release like it's the cinematic equivalent of Soylent Green.

I was always under the assumption that the production- heavy, script-light days of De Millian, period blockbusters were behind us. Guess I missed big-time on that one. But one of the questions in my mind at this juncture isn't who has seen Titanic, but rather who hasn't — even Billy from Iowa snuck his pet ferret into the theater.

Though I still don't get it, here's just a few hypotheses on who these deadbeats are:

The dead — Hollywood studio research has indicated that corpses are the most difficult consumer base to reach, although Shirley MacLaine begs to differ. As such, it follows that most of the deceased will never see Titanic.

People who have had their eyes pokcd out — It's all fun and games until somebody loses their eyes and can only enjoy the aural pleasure of hearing the unmercifully hammy Billy Zane cry, "I hope you enjoy your time together" or any of the other stock sneers he seethes over the course of the film.

Steven Spielberg — Steve makes The Color Purple, superbly acted, written and directed adaptation of Pulitzer Prize-winning Alice Walker novel. Steve has Negroes in non-comedic or slave roles in movie. Steve gets shafted by Academy.

Steve makes Amistad, notch below Color Purple in quality, but theme of slavery is always old white Academy voter favorite. The error — the slaves aren't nobly slaughtered in Civil War and they're remarkably pissed off to boot. Steve gets double-shafted.

(Great thing about soapboxes — not only can you preach from 'em, but they boost a 5-foot-8 quasi-runt like me to Muresanian proportions, if only for a moment. Incidentally, this is in no way an endorsement to see My Giant.)

Now that we've tackled the tough challenge of who's had their butt firmly planted in a cave for three months of unnerving hoopla, we can address the other question at hand — who is still seeing Titanic? I'm so frigging exhausted just thinking about the length of the movie — God forbid there's ever a director's cut — that I'm afraid my snappy lead-in will have to be "See below".

C. Taylor Conner

James Cameron — "Let's see here. If I see it 4,786 more times, I can probably cover a thirteenth of the publicity costs..."

Girls — Maybe it's some karmic punishment for not enough guys taking their sweet-muffins to One Fine Day, but you'd think the average female might not go so unabashedly ga-ga over an underwritten relationship overshadowed by striking technical accuracy. Then again, The First Wives Club was a hit, so...

Horny people — The upside of spending a Dances With Wolves duration in a lame multiplex is, of course, the insta- game effect of Titanic. You bring a date to this flick and sooner or later this scenario will happen to you:

TOM (sobbing): He... was... all... frozen. That was so sad.

MELISSA: Yeah. Remember when he saves her life?

TOM: Oh, that was so cool.

MELISSA: Yeah. Remember when they first kiss?

TOM: Oh, that was so romantic.

MELISSA: Yeah. Remember when they get their hanky- dory in a sloppy, sweaty way in the back of that car?

TOM: Yeah. You got the keys to the Pulsar?

The important thing we must keep in perspective is that, much like the H. Long actioner Firestorm, Titanic-mania so soon shall pass. A little hunch of mine indicates Leonardo DiCaprio's next release, The Man in the Iron Mask — whose swordfights will be nothing compared to the accent clashes between Gerard Depardieu, Jeremy Irons, Gabriel Byrne, John Malkovich and Mr. Frigid Paperweight himself, Leo — will help us get over stiffs most of us never knew sucking down a chilly bongful and sinking.

Regardless of what occurs, however, I suppose some folks' hearts will still go on.

(Oh, that reminds me — screw Celine Dion, the French Canadian anti-Christ.)

FOCUS ON THE WAR ON DRUGS

The war on citizens

War-time propaganda is a craft with three basic rules: 1. Make the public feel threatened by the enemy; 2. Disempower, discredit and dehumanize the enemy; and 3. Honesty is not important. The Cannabis Reform Coalition (CRC) has been observing these tactics employed against Americans by their own government.

Brian S. Julin

Through aggressive use of donated advertising space, and now through a multi-million dollar federal budget for anti-drug propaganda, the public is made to feel they are endangered by other people's drug use.

We are told stories about crimes, accidents and deaths which can somehow be blamed on drugs. Drug users are being silenced and kept from positions of wealth and influence. The information and tactics being used are incredibly dishonest.

Consider the long-standing argument that marijuana legalization would result in large numbers of automobile accidents, despite the fact that allergy medications cause many more accidents, per user, than marijuana. Consider the so-called "fact" that drugs make addicts commit crime, despite the obvious reason that, by virtue of being illegal, drugs are more expensive than an addict can possibly afford through a legal job. Consider the multi-billion dollar industry which analyzes the urine of our workers for drugs, when no serious scientific study has shown this to reduce work-place accidents or increase productivity. Honesty is not important to the drug warrior.

For those of you who do not scare easily, though, they have a different sales pitch — saving the users from themselves. You are told that drug users hurt their own families, but not that alcohol is the worst offender, nor about all the families broken up by the government and put on welfare by a jail term or a lost job. You are told that drug users are "losers" and cannot succeed, but not that this is on purpose, that drug testing denies drug users job opportunity, that impoverished drug users and even recovered addicts are being denied the help normally given to the rest of the poor. Neither are you told about all the drug users who do succeed, unless they are being stripped of their success (as was recently attempted with the Olympics snowboarding gold medalist).

The perpetuation of drug problems by the War on Drugs is its most loathsome and least well-known quality — a twisted sense of morals has led drug warriors to the stance that "drug users must be made into losers whether they really are losers or not." It has long been known that even hard drug addicts can recover and/or lead productive lives if they have the benefit of a stable family life and steady employment. Unbelievably, those who say they want to "save the users from themselves" are turning around and doing exactly the opposite by denying them opportunity, social normality and even self-esteem.

And to those who have been taught to view drug users as a threat, the dishonesty only increases. Rather than pursue serious treatment for drug users, the government elects to spend your tax dollars putting them in prison. Rather than undercut the black market with maintenance programs for addicts, we allow organized crime to exploit addicts and non-users alike, and force everyone to live with the consequences of a thriving underground drug market.

Punishment, interdiction and social stigma have all failed to end our drug problem for nearly four decades. How the drug warriors manage to convince the American public that they will suddenly start to work is beyond us

While the UMass Cannabis Reform Coalition only supports the full legalization of marijuana for adult use, it is impossible to overlook the fact that the current approaches towards dealing with "drugs" as a whole need some sort of change. Marijuana users are much more well-off than hard drug addicts, but as we face some of the same problems we can see that the answer does not lie in waging war on the users themselves. Even Drug Czar Barry McCaffrey has admitted that "we cannot arrest our way out of this problem."

Punishment, interdiction and social stigma have all failed to end our drug problem for nearly four decades. How the drug warriors manage to convince the American public that they will suddenly start to work is beyond us. In the words of Albert Einstein "insanity is doing the same thing over and over again and expecting different results."

Unfortunately, selling the War on Drugs to the public has been easy for the government to accomplish. Unlike the recent preparations for more military activity in the Gulf, the weapons used in the War on Drugs do not appear harmful and the collateral damage to both drug users and America itself is not blatantly obvious. Unfortunately, Schwarzkopf was right: "the first casualty is truth." We hope our efforts to promote education about drugs and drug policy will help America to wise up to the War on Drugs' political sham.

War costly and ineffective

The war on drugs is a multi-billion dollar a year industry. Virtually every agency of the U.S. government is involved, from the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Drug Enforcement Agency, to the National Park Service and the Coast Guard. This industry exists because nearly any agency can receive millions or even billions of dollars for being hard on drugs. Yet no agency has control over the war effort. Most agencies involved perform their part in the War on Drugs with little, if any, communication with other agencies. This lack of structure in the War on Drugs is the main cause of its ineffectiveness, but is also the key for its survival.

Sean Marien

Last year President Clinton proposed $16 billion for the war effort, the largest amount in history, up from a mere $1 billion in 1980. The largest cut of this year's budget goes to the Bureau of Prisons, which received a whopping one-eighth of the total spending, over $2 billion. Another $815 million goes to the Office of Justice Programs, and $621 million goes to the Federal Judiciary. Both help to counteract the cost of increased numbers of criminal cases filed in federal courts. Two hundred eighty-one million dollars went to the Federal Prisoners Detention and $273 million went to U.S. Attorneys, both to cover the costs of drug related arrests and trials. All totaled, over $4 billion, or one-quarter of the entire Drug War effort, was spent entirely on post-arrest expenses, not including treatment programs.

Of the $16 billion allocated for this year's budget, only $3.5 billion is directed towards drug treatment and prevention programs, the only programs that provide direct services to improve the health of the American people.

The government spent over $8 billion of this year's drug budget to try to reduce the availability of illegal drugs. Departments such as the DEA, the FBI, the U.S. Marshals and the Secret Service, to name a few, were all employed in the drug effort. While drug arrests are up, over one and a half million in 1996, the availability of cocaine and marijuana, as well as other drugs, was unaffected.

The inability of the drug war's policing force to affect the supply or the use of illegal drugs leads us to question whether or not the War on Drugs is effective or economically valid.

The biggest battle of the drug war has been fought against marijuana. In the past the issue of marijuana legalization has come in and out of the public eye. During the early 1970s many states made marijuana illegal but not a criminal offense. The movement lasted until the 1980s when President Ronald Reagan was elected. His goal was to win the Drug War. To do this, all drugs were to be made highly illegal, including marijuana. Recently the idea to make marijuana legal has re-entered the public opinion. This time the idea is not to make marijuana legal for everyone, just for those who have a definite need for the medicinal uses of the drug.

Throughout the history of the Drug War, there has been much debate on the medicinal validity of marijuana. Thirty years ago there was intense scientific research on marijuana, most of which showed favorable medicinal qualities. Yet the government chose not to allow any use of the drug in fear of losing all support for the War on Drugs. In 1972, Nixon appointed a commission to determine the medicinal value of marijuana. President Nixon appointed many scientists and doctors he believed would report marijuana had no medicinal value. To his surprise the commission gave marijuana high medical value and a low danger to users. However, this report was covered up, and further reports were not allowed by the classing of the drug. Effectively, President Nixon turned the War on Drugs into a lens, making the public view marijuana as an evil weed that destroys people's lives.

The issue of whether marijuana has medicinal value has again reached the pinnacle of public awareness. Recent reports by the British Institute of Medicine and testimonials by hundreds of thousands of ailing Americans have shown that marijuana indeed has medicinal value ranging from the ability to slow down the damage caused by glaucoma to helping people from wasting away from AIDS and cancer. However, until marijuana is allowed to be tested by the FDA and the National Institute for Health, there will be no definite medical value of marijuana in the eyes of government.

The refusal of the American government to allow testing for medical benefits of marijuana is why it remains illegal. Because there are so many different agencies in our government that have some ability to alter how the government views marijuana, it will be a while before the government can collectively agree on a new policy for marijuana. Once the initial barriers are removed, marijuana will be found to have medicinal value, and be made legal to those who need it.

In conclusion, the War on Drugs is not just a war against the immoralities of using illegal drugs, but a war against every man, woman and child that have legitimate use of medicinal marijuana. The War on Drugs is a costly and mostly ineffective policy that has continued for many years.

Letters to the Editor

Administration continues twisting the truth

To the editor:

On March 2, Associate Chancellor Sue Pearson sent out an e-mail to all faculty, graduate students and staff informing them of the tentative contract agreement reached between Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) and the administration. In this letter she uses the phrase "as previously proposed by the administration" every time she refers to a settlement made in mediation.

She is not just lying, but saying that graduate students are stupid. She is saying that graduate students were stupid to negotiate for so long; she is saying that graduate students were stupid to mobilize and hold rallies which ultimately brought the administration back to the bargaining table; and she is saying that graduate students are stupid not to take what the administration gives us.

The reality of the situation is that GEO has emerged victorious in many ways over the administration. The most notable victory is that we refused to let the administration break us up into subgroups, with only a few groups receiving wage benefits while the others get nothing. GEO fought for everyone to receive the same wage package, and they were victorious.

The result is a 45 percent increase in the guaranteed minimum wage for all employees, which was not "previously proposed by the administration."

Stopping deforestation isn't the answer

To the editor:

This is in response to Laura Jakutowicz's article entitled "Abenakis raise funds to combat deforestation" (Feb. 27).

Before any readers support banning the "deforestation of the northeast," please consider the big picture of industrial forestry. First, I would like to offer some insight on the hardwoods that are being "destroyed."

Most of the forests owned by paper companies in the northeast have been highgraded for the last 200 years. This means that the previous private landowners only "cut the best and left the rest."

It is true that the paper companies are trying to produce softwoods to make paper products. They have no use for the poor quality hardwoods because they are genetically inferior and therefore of little value commercially. This is why they spray herbicides which kill the hardwoods and allow the softwoods the competitive advantage they need. It is not their fault that their forests were previously exploited. They are just trying to make do with what they have (and, incidently, pay taxes on).

Secondly, if the paper companies are harvesting softwood timber in the Northeast, there must be a demand for paper. Despite claims of someday forming a paperless society, the United States is actually using more paper now than ever. By "banning all the commercial logging activities on the territory," we stand the chance of putting the paper companies out of business.

Assuming all the paper companies' forestland is sold, one possible scenario shows that all the land stands the chance of being subdivided into small parcels. The developers will take over and the forests will be filled with residential housing and WalMarts. While slightly exaggerated, this would permanently eliminate large expanses of forest and any further supply of wood (not to mention any form of contiguous management). In another scenario, the federal government could buy the land. This means taxes go up and the local towns lose all their property tax bases.

Since human population seems to be growing exponentially, it is safe to assume that the demand for forest products will also be increasing. If the northeast is no longer permitted to produce some of these products, the paper companies will find other places. Do we really want to pay $10 a roll for imported toilet paper? So, by stopping timber harvesting in the northeast, you're not really getting to the root of the problem. Society needs to realize that to use the present amount of paper and wood products, certain sacrifices in the way our forests appear (temporarily) will have to be made.

In reference to the article's descriptions of clearcuts as being "wastelands of devastation...", yes, they are ugly. But is Jakutowicz even remotely aware that northern New England forests are capable of regenerating naturally? Most of the forests around campus were completely cleared for agriculture in the last two centuries and have grown back just fine.

This concern about the forests of New England is genuine, but we can't just "ban all commercial logging activities." There are other important considerations. We should strive for a way to meet the northeast's socioeconomic needs while conserving natural resources and respecting historical landowners.

Smoking in public a taxpayer right

To the editor:

Thanks so much to Marty Keane for his anti-smoking editorial (March 3). But you know what, Marty? Fach and every foul, rank exhale your tragic lungs make in delivering those fascist sentiments offends me more than your sensitive and discriminating little nose can imagine.

As far as you're concerned, "smokers should have no right to smoke in public. Any where. Any time."

Well, your precious Amherst bars are, in fact, private establishments owned by individuals and supported by the public. The "aromatic subset of our college population" is not a demographic so small it can be dismissed with one scoff... however asthmatic that scoff may be. If the environs of your favorite night spot are so toxic that you can no longer stand to patronize the establishment, you should speak to the owner. It is his responsibility to market to whatever clientele he chooses, not that of the state and federal governments.

You see, smokers pay taxes. This entitles us to smoke in public places. "Any time. Any [public] place." Smokers aren't the crude, insensitive lot you describe in your editorial. In fact, most smokers are courteous and socially conscious of their actions.

Your cutting insight into the contrast between alcoholism and cigarette smoking was even more impressive. "...If I'm in a bar pounding beers on a nightly basis, the adverse consequences of my actions affect only me, not everyone else in the bar." Actually, it affects every taxpayer in the bar who has to sift through the fallout of your shattered family.

"I implore those of you who do smoke to think for a minute about what you are doing unwittingly does to those around you, never mind yourself." Well, Marty, I have thought about it. My conclusion is that I am not "smelly," "arrogant," "self-centered" or even "aromatic." I am very socially conscious of my toxic addiction, and furthermore, I enjoy it.

R-rated chants at hockey game

To the editor:

It was wonderful to see so many students at the hockey game against Boston University this past Friday night. The UMass team played very well, but were beaten mostly by the referee.

However, the major disturbance at the Mullins Center came from a vocal group of students with a PG-13 or R-rated chant. I am sure that the parents of the small children in the Mullins Center did not appreciate the choice of words used. After all, the games have become very much a family-centered event.

Sure, there will be those of you who will say, "but this is a college campus... such language will be heard here and there." To that I ask, where has the student population been for the other 12 games this season? All of these other folks have been here every week with their families — where were you?

At the next game you attend, and I know how important a large and lively crowd of fans can energize a team, please try to respect those little kids in the stands. Keep your cheers to something you would not mind explaining to your little sister.

Hidden history

"Fabulous" is the word that comes to mind when I think of the weekend I just spent at the University of Michigan for the National Jewish LesBiGay (lesbian, bisexual and gay) student leadership conference.

About 30 students attended the conference. From all across the country. There were even a few international students. It was sponsored by the AHAVA Collective (the gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender (GLBT) Jewish group at the University of Michigan), Lights-in-Action (a group of North American Jewish students) and the University of Michigan Hillel.

When I boarded the plane, I did not know what exactly to expect. I knew I was going to have a good time, but I didn't realize I was going to have a great time. When I first heard about the conference I was surprised and extremely happy there was an event of this kind. I was so excited that I was going to spend a weekend with other Jewish GLB students.

"How can we gain the freedom to have same- sex marriages if we don't get the support of the heterosexual community? Gays and lesbians have to educate the general public to the truth that same-sex marriages are not an evil thing."

Jesse Pasackow

One of the main reasons I was going was to try and get ideas on how to start a Jewish GLB group here at UMass. I think it is important for Jewish GLB students to have some sort of group in which they can get answers to questions about how they fit into Judaism, as well as for the social aspect.

The conference started out with a speech called "Gay Marriages in the Twenty-First Century?" by Evan Wolfson, director of the Marriage Project for the Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund. Wolfson spoke about the court case in Hawaii that is pending right now, and a few other cases. He also focused on the fact that if the gay community is to get the freedom to have same-sex marriages, then it must branch its efforts of support out to the heterosexual community. We have to educate them and get straight support in fighting for the freedom of same-sex marriages.

Wolfson cited a Newsweek article that 56 percent of the public opposes our freedom to marry.

"While we need to push to make it at least 56 percent in our favor, this is already an extraordinary, encouraging, and instructive improvement, given that two years ago most Americans had never been asked to think about this question," he said.

His idea of reaching out to the straight community is very important. How can we gain the freedom to have same-sex marriages if we don't get the support of the heterosexual community? Gays and lesbians have to educate the general public to the truth that same-sex marriages are not an evil thing.

After he spoke, the participants of the conference stared the afternoon workshops. The first workshop I attended was on how to start a Jewish GLBT group on campus. That workshop was very informative and gave me some great ideas on how to start a group here at UMass. One of the ideas that we thought of was to have a Shabbat dinner and have a speaker talk about GLB Jews in today's society.

The second workshop I went to was entitled "Rabbi Yochanan & Rabbi Lakish: More Than Just Friends." There was a Talmudic story about these two men's chance meeting which we discussed, and we also looked at some other Talmudic stories and their Midrashes.

It was very interesting to look at gay life in the Jewish historic world. Not many Jews actually look at or know of the stories that we discussed. To see that some famous Jewish thinkers were gay or had homosexual feelings made me feel a sense of pride within myself. I always enjoy hearing about gay or lesbians who were famous in history — it gives me some role models to follow.

Sunday was the final day of the conference. We watched a documentary film called "Chicks in White Satin" about two Jewish woman getting married. It talked to the two woman and their family members and it showed the wedding ceremony. I really like it because, even though I have heard about same-sex marriages, I had never seen a Jewish one. It was heart-warming to see two women under the Chupah breaking the glass and thinking that maybe someday that will be me and my partner.

We ended the conference planning for next year's conference, which will be held at Smith College. We then went around and shared our thoughts about the conference. One feeling mentioned often was the feeling of being whole. We were in an environment in which it wasn't just Jewish students, or just gay and lesbian students, but both. We were all Jewish and gay, lesbian or bisexual.

I truly had a great time at the conference and I look forward to starting a GLBT Jewish group here at UMass.

COME CLEAN Curve
Esupando/Universal

At first Curve might sound a bit like the band Garbage. But bear in mind — Curve came first.

After a five-year sabbatical, British electronic/industrial rock pioneers Curve have released their third LP Come Clean (in stores on March 10), one of the most anticipated albums of 1998. The buzz surrounding Come Clean would be much greater if only people have even heard of Curve, let alone understand their impact. Curve has undoubtedly left their fingerprints on music as we know it.

Before touring with The Cure and The Jesus and Mary Chain, band members Toni Halliday and Dean Garcia were busy keeping one step ahead of the London dance music scene, paving the way for such acts as The Chemical Brothers and Prodigy. And while industrial music was slipping into the mainstream here in the States, Curve was working with such bands as Nine Inch Nails and Ministry.

Come Clean is not a drastic departure for Curve. While their previous albums, such as 1992's Doppelganger, were packed with rough guitar edges, Curve seems to have caught the techno bug with Come Clean. Most of the hard guitar sounds have been traded in for synths and sequencers with excellent results. Curve's new sound is both abrasive and addictive, both raw and refined. To put Come Clean's basic soundscape in a nutshell would not do the album justice, but let's say that it's a melting pot filled with techno and industrial, a splash of trip-hop, and a lot of dark drum and bass sounds. This concoction creates one of the most intense albums in recent memory, packed with hooks and catchy rhythms that grip the listener through all of its 13 tracks.

Come Clean gets off to a jump start with the first track "Chinese Burn," which is the first single and was released as an EP last November. Come Clean continues with unfailing intensity with the next two tracks, "Coming Up Roses" and "Something Familiar." Other tracks that are nothing short of excellence are "Sweetback," "Forgotten Sanity" and the title track "Come Clean."

Considering Curve's previous work, Come Clean is not so much a change in genre. It seems more like Garcia and Halliday are smoothly shifting gears. Producing themselves, Halliday and Garcia are joined by Steve Osborne and Tim Simmon, whose credits include working with Depeche Mode. Also lending a hand on Come Clean are master mixer Alan Moulder. Flood, helping with synths and programming, and Elastica's Justin providing some drum beats.

As for the dance house ambience of Come Clean — which was recorded at The Beatles' renowned studio, Abbey Road — Halliday said, "We wanted to capture the idea that this record was made in London. It came out of the whole atmosphere of living here, so we wanted to make that point. We wanted something with grit in it."

There is no doubt that Halliday and Garcia's return to the studio was one of the most welcome in years; a warm reception for a band that was always well ahead of its time. A

Soundtracks are often difficult to listen to, because you usually have to filter through 10 tracks of trash to get to the couple of decent songs you want to hear. Either that or the material has already been released and you have no need to buy it again. Therefore if you have more then two or three good new songs, you can usually consider the soundtrack a success.

Caught Up manages to break that mold with enough bumping tracks that you will not need to use the fast forward button on your CD player. Snoop Dogg Dogg and Karupt set it off with "Ride On\Caught Up." Okay, the Doggfather is played out, and his last album appeared more in the used CD bin then in whips, but he shows what he is capable of on this track.

Given that there's too much west coast on here, I'll get to the east. Gang Starr's "Work" shows why he is still on top of the hip-hop pyramid. Lost Boyz do their thing on "Ordinary Guy," and you know you'll be looking for the herbals cause that's how they do. The two best tracks come courtesy of Killah Priest, Inspectah Deck and GZA and KRS-One, Shaggy and Mad Lion, respectively. On "Cross My Heart" it looks like the killer bees are back and Killah Priest might have some of the sickest skills in the clan. As for "Ey-Yo!(The Reggae Virus)," let's just say it's a dance hall classic already.

Get through the filler courtesy of Joe, Do or Die, Luniz, and you have a fairly bumping album. Then again you might just wait for the singles to appear on mixed tapes. B- (Adam Dlugacz)

God almighty. Why does this crap just fall into my lap? Why does it seem like any monkey with a guitar can get signed by a label when clearly they should just live in quiet anonymity at the local bar playing all the classic rock hits you know and love.

When I first listened to both of these albums I was like "not bad..." The Flourescen album started off well enough, with an autoharp starting off the song "Slaughterhouse With A Bed." But it all went downhill from there.

Cola knew how to play their instruments and for that I give them kudos, a doff of my cap. Unfortunately, the music wasn't altogether captivating and I found myself playing solitaire and not concentrating on the music. What went wrong?

The problem is, in critlcspeak, some inherent need to find the exact nature of what is good or bad with a certain band or song. Here, I just can't seem to put my finger on it. Both bands seem to play in key and obviously they practiced once or twice. They are extremely and mind-blowingly competent.

And that just might be it. They are only competent. These albums don't have any standout tracks or anything in the writing that makes you want to hear more. They just don't get jiggy with it. If you know what I mean. High Contrast Comedown — C-, Whatnot — C- (Mike Messaros)

REVENGE IS SWEET, AND SO ARE YOU
Mr. T Experience
Lookout

Trax On Trax Off

Revenge is Sweet, and So Are You, the eighth full-length album by the Mr. T Experience, is full of twisted humor, undeniably catchy music and interesting contradictions. Despite a punk sound evoking the Ramones' blaring, fast- paced style, the selections are all weirdly insightful and witty love songs. Tracks such as "Swiss Army Girlfriend," "Lawnmower of Love," and "The Weather is Here, Wish You Were Beautiful" grab hold of your attention with their rapid-fire guitar riffs, but are more remarkable for their amusing and brutally honest lyrics. In the poppy "With My Looks and Your Brains," lead singer Dr. Frank puts down his girlfriend, condescendingly singing, "So hold my hand, just like we planned, so you won't get lost, and I won't get thrown out."

The disc becomes repetitive after a while, until the thirteenth track, "I Don't Need You Now." The northern California trio lose the electric guitars in favor of an acoustic treatment, which stands out against the CD's clamor. The band makes up for the absent noise with amplified lyrical wit. Dr. Frank rants, "I've discovered other things to hate... I still don't like how much you don't want me to touch you, but I don't need you now." Straightforward, clever, and at times insultingly mean lyrics such as this permeate the album.

Hard to take seriously at first, the Mr. T Experience grow on you with their upbeat, clever punk. They're loud, thoughtful, sad, funny, intelligent and dumb all at once. Their unique sound is fun to listen to, just hard to define — kind of like their name. B+ (Brendan Lynch) wish we were musicians.

With all these bigger name stars around, people like Kathleen Wilhoite may get overlooked. She doesn't fall into either category. She's neither angry nor soft. Her concerts aren't sold out. Most of you probably haven't even heard of her. But you should.

She's the girl next door. As soon as you put on Pitch Like a Girl, you'll be wondering if you have heard her before. At least that's what I did.

On the album, her vocal abilities are celebrated in each and every song. Accompanied by her acoustic guitar, she creates a light sound that brings the soothing sounds of Sheryl Crow to mind. Her voice is cheerful, though not always perfectly in tune, which is OK. The effect is down- to-earth music that speaks of popular themes.

The opening "Whatever It Takes" gives out a message of a passionate twentysomething just trying to make it "out there." Sound familiar? Well, frankly, so does the rest of the album as she sings of the same troubles with relationships and life. While Wilhoite sings of the same popular themes as the Alanises and Jewels, she doesn't really offer any advice. But that's not why we listen to music, or it shouldn't be anyway.

Pitch Like a Girl is an album you can listen to while you're studying. Or better yet, pop it in the stereo on a rainy Sunday when you're in one of those moods. Either way, you won't have to skip any songs or worry that you're annoying your roommate. This is the type of thing that most people can like and relate to. This is definitely one to try out. B+ (Gena Mavuli)

AT ZERO
Kerosene 454
Slowdime/Dischord

Well, now here is a band that knows how to get jiggy with it. On this, their third album, Kerosene 454 tightens up their already impressive sound on what could be their best album. The problem with their last two albums — if you had to find a problem — was that there was just too much. Instrumentals seemed to just drag on, there were too many drum breaks (even if the drumming is always impressive) and some stuff merely sounded the same.

On At Zero, the band has put out an album that is still bursting like their other works, but with more meat, less fat. "Electrics on the Rise," is one of the most melodic tracks they have ever written and the next track, "In For Even," is pretty impressive as well.

With this album, we can only hope for new things out of this band. With hardcore and its various offshoot genres growing stagnant by the day, Kerosene 454 seems to be growing comfortable with making edgy music that still has a great sense of melody and tune. B+ (M.M.)

BLESSID UNION OF SOULS
Blessid Union of Souls
Capitol

The group that debuted last year with the catchy single "I Believe" has come back with another Top 40 hit. If you listen to the radio at all, chances are you've heard Blessid Union of Souls' latest hit "I Wanna Be There." It leads off their new self-titled album with an odd mix of upbeat music with the unavoidable depressing sound of lead singer Eliot Sloan. But, it does have one of those tunes that sticks in your head for hours. I caught myself humming that catchy little song long after I heard it.

The album moves along to "Jelly," which has a slow resonating beat that has the ability to depress someone in the best of moods. Though the words are powerful, I just couldn't get past the slow melody. It made me forget about the good things the song was saying and think about all the things that have gone wrong in my life. I don't exactly love feeling that way at the end of a song. He does speak of how in love he is, which should cheer people up, but it's really hard to get by that voice.

The rest of the CD moves on in much of the same way. A long, slow song followed by more upbeat music. I can't help but suggest that all these songs are very similar in every aspect. They all speak of love, either good or bad. Most have suggestions on relationships, so all of you that are having trouble in paradise, this is your CD. You may hate the music, but you can't miss the message.

Blessid Union of Souls isn't bad for Top 40 music, but they definitely leave room for improvement. C (G.M.)

THE OATH THAT KEEPS ME FREE
Earth Crisis
Victory

HELL ON EARTH
In Cold Blood
Victory

For better or for worse heavy metal and hardcore punk have always gone hand in hand. However, there have been bands who have managed to skate the fine line and bands who just go over the edge. Earth Crisis has taken that metallic edge to a point where it's hard to argue that they are not flat-out metal. In Cold Blood follow along Earth Crisis's footsteps, only they trip over every step.

The Oath That Keeps Me Free is a live album taken from a show in Syracuse. You do get two new songs "Fate of Neo-Gods" and "Smash or Be Smashed" and a cover of Cream's "Sunshine Of Your Love." While live albums don't normally work, this is a better representation of Earth Crisis then any of their studio work. The power of the bands metallic approach comes off, rather then getting bogged down in the repetitiveness of their other albums. Classics like "All Out War" and "Firestorm" showcase Earth Crisis's two finest moments.

In Cold Blood is basically Integrity without Dwid singing. Too bad they're terrible. This is flat-out speed metal, with breakdowns for all the tough guys to mosh it up. This is basically what happens when bands spend too much time listening to Slayer instead of Minor Threat or the Cro-Mags.

The Oath That Keeps Me Free — A-, Hell On Earth — D (A.D.)

COMPARSA
Deep Forest III
550 Music

My original review for this album was just going to read "Mmmmm... lulling." But damn these soft music giants, they had to throw a monkey wrench into the machinery. I thought I knew what to expect: some lulling, sleepytime music and some Indian-esque chants.

Instead, Deep Forest had technno added to the mix on this new album. That original review would have been so easy to write.

The only problem is, I never found Deep Forest all that compelling. I've never been fond of techno, especially when the kid across the hall is blasting it while I'm in my room. The combination of the two is at least appealing, but never that great. It was certainly a good move by the band to try to expand their sound and hey, I give them props. But in the end, Comparsa doesn't amount to anything more than an average effort. C (M.M.)

News on Elle, Fergie & Rushdie

VERBIER, Switzerland (AP) — Sarah Ferguson chipped a shoulder bone when she fell while skiing, her office said last week.

The 38-year-old duchess was coming down a slope last weekend behind her 7-year-old daughter, Eugenie, when she fell awkwardly, picked herself up and made it down herself.

She went to see a doctor. The injury isn't serious and she won't cut her vacation short.

"The duchess is in considerable pain but is expected to stay on in Verbier," her office said in a statement.

With Ferguson, Eugenie and 9-year-old Beatrice is a friend, Italian aristocrat Count Gaddu della Gherardesca, and a former boyfriend, motor racing millionaire Paddy McNally. Her ex, Prince Andrew visited as planned on Thursday to celebrate his 38th birthday.

Model Elle Macpherson gave birth to a boy last weekend in New York, a newspaper said.

The baby, born in a Manhattan hospital, was named Arpad Flynn Busson after his father and weighed in at 7 pounds, the Daily Telegraph said. His parents will call him Flynn.

Mother and baby were doing well, the newspaper said. The model retreated with her husband and newborn to a hotel suite where they have been staying for two weeks.

The British government promised to keep fighting Iran's death sentence against Salman Rushdie.

"Iran should be in no doubt that this issue is an obstacle to better relations with the United Kingdom," Foreign Secretary Robin Cook told reporters after a meeting with the author. "It is appalling that the threat to his life remains after all this time."

Rushdie has been in hiding since 1989, when the late Iranian leader Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini declared that he had blasphemed Islam in The Satanic Verses.

Britain will mobilize support in the 15-nation European Union, Cook said.

Iran renewed the fatwa Friday and the bounty on Rushdie's head stands at $2.5 million.

Rushdie, who has been more visible in recent months, called the death threat "a colossal pressure," adding, "It is a very unpleasant thing that someone is offering money for my death."

Michael Jackson is planning a fund-raising concert in Seoul, South Korea, later this year to help starving North Korean children.

Tentatively called "We Are The World 2," the concert will be held Oct. 10 at the Olympic Stadium and broadcast live in 120 countries, an aide to President-elect Kim Dae-jung said last week.

"Mr. Jackson is enthusiastically pursuing the project. He has been and will be contacting some 50 other celebrities and world leaders for participation," said the aide, Choi Kyu-sun.

Those being invited include Luciano Pavarotti, Whitney Houston, Celine Dion, Boys II Men, Elizabeth Taylor, Michael Jordan and Tiger Woods, Choi said.

For taped messages and appeals to be aired during the concert, Jackson is in contact with such luminaries as Pope John Paul II and South African President Nelson Mandela, Choi said.

"Mr. Jackson's side has been in contact with North Korea. But we can't say whether or not the hope will come true, " Choi said.

Getting to Carnegie Hall wasn't the problem for the Minnesota Orchestra.

Soloist Kathleen Battle was in the middle of a piece from Verdi's opera Attila on when the lights dimmed by half, then dimmed again until the stage was almost completely dark. She kept singing, and three accompanying musicians kept playing. Music director Eiji Oue said afterward that if Battle had stopped, he would have followed her lead.

"But we all have that piece memorized. It's like walking to your kitchen in the dark," he said.

Grammys attract critics after revamping awards

By David Klignman
Associated Press

The British band Radiohead produced what one poll of critics rated the best album of 1997 — an ambitious cycle of rock songs that soars to operatic heights with its vision of paranoia in the computer age.

Shouldn't that have made Radiohead the favorite to take home music's most prestigious award when the 40th annual Grammy Awards were presented last week? Well, no.

Despite revamping the Grammys' top categories after the 1995 awards, it remains to be seen whether the most acclaimed music can actually win.

Two years ago, Pearl Jam failed to win the best album award for the breakthrough Vitalogy. And last year, Beck had rave reviews for Odelay but lost the award to Celine Dion.

That Radiohead's OK Computer was even nominated is proof the Grammys have finally gotten with the times, says Michael Greene, president of the National Academy of Recording Arts & Sciences, the Grammy's governing board.

"Our constituency is getting so much more hip, so much younger that we are rapidly approaching a time when pretty much anything can happen," says Greene, who noted that dance, remix and Spanish rock categories were new this year.

And yet nothing really has changed, complains Thomas O'Neil, author of The Grammys: For the Record. He says the awards — mocked by some as the "Grannies" — are still hopelessly out of touch with anyone younger than 40.

"They've been dismissed as being notoriously fuddy-duddy," says O'Neil. "It's nice that they're trying to make a serious effort to address their problems, but I'm not sure that they've come up with a solution yet."

Three years ago, NARAS tried to fend off criticism that the Grammys had become irrelevant by selecting more diverse music. A secret panel of about 20 industry insiders began nominating the top awards — record, song, album and best new artist of the year. There currently are 9,000 members eligible to vote in NARAS.

The nominations changed a bit but the winners tended to be more of the same, with top Grammys still being awarded to romantic ballads (Seal's "Kiss From a Rose") or overdue veterans (Eric Clapton).

The Grammy's biggest problem is that there is no way to monitor whether members actually listen to all the music they vote for, O'Neil says. That translates to winners with the biggest names but not always the best music.

"There are 50,000 CD releases every year," O'Neil says. "There is no conceivable way that the Grammy voters could be familiar with all that music. Ninety percent of the voters have never heard OK Computer and never will."

That could explain why winners tend to repeat year after year. Perennial winners include Vince Gill (country), Clapton (rock) and Babyface (rhythm and blues).

It may also be the reason why the Grammys seem to have the biggest credibility problem of the major entertainment awards. This, after all, is the group that has awarded Michael Bolton the same number of Grammys as the Rolling Stones (two). And top Grammys have been awarded to such now-dismissed acts as Starland Vocal Band ("Afternoon Delight"), Christopher Cross ("Sailing") and USA for Africa ("We Are the World").

Perhaps the most embarrassing gaffe occurred after the Academy named the pop duo Milli Vanilli best new artist of 1989. Bandmates Rob Pilatus and Fab Morvan were stripped of the award after it was revealed they did not sing a note on their best-selling album. O'Neil says the Grammys should adopt the process used by the Emmys in which panels of the television academy are forced to watch everything nominated — without showing any outward biases — before they can vote.

Greene admits the Grammy's system may not be perfect but works just fine. His admonition at the top and bottom of each ballot urges members not to vote in categories if they haven't heard the music.

Doby, three others welcomed into Baseball Hall of Fame

By Ben Walker
Associated Press

TAMPA, Fla. — More than a half-century ago, Larry Doby walked into a Cleveland clubhouse where some teammates would not even shake his hand.

Yesterday, he got a much warmer welcome from the Hall of Fame. Doby, the first black player in the American League, was an easy choice as the Veterans Committee voted in its full limit of four new members.

Former AL president Lee MacPhail, Negro leagues star "Bullet" Joe Rogan and turn-of-the-century shortstop "Gorgeous" George Davis also were elected.

Induction ceremonies will be July 26 in Cooperstown, N.Y. Don Sutton will be enshrined, too, having been chosen by the Baseball Writers Association of America in January.

"You look back 51 years ago and you never thought this type of situation would come about," Doby said by telephone from Southern California, where he was visiting former Brooklyn pitcher Don Newcombe.

"You think about some of the changes that have happened in baseball," he said. "It's a feeling of struggle in the past. It's a feeling of a certain amount of relief. It's a great feeling."

Doby, a seven-time All-Star outfielder who went on to become a manager and an executive, had come close before. The last two years, in fact, he was at a Tampa hotel, hoping and waiting for a joyous call that never came.

The 13-man Veterans panel, which included Ted Williams, Stan Musial and Yogi Berra, does not announce its vote totals. It took 75 percent for election, meaning 10 votes, and the choice of Doby was described by one committee member as a simple one.

Doby did not always have it so easy, however.

On July 5, 1947, just 11 weeks after Jackie Robinson broke baseball's color barrier, Doby joined the Indians. Though he would go on to hit .283 with 253 home runs and 969 RBIs in a big league career that lasted through 1959, his locker room reception that first day was chilly.

"Very tough," Doby recalled. "I'd never faced any circumstances like that. Teammates were lined up and some would greet you and some wouldn't. You could deal with it, but it was hard."

MacPhail, 80, became part of history with his election. His dad, Larry, was already in the Hall, making the MacPhails the first father-son tandem to be so honored.

MacPhail was general manager of the New York Yankees and Baltimore Orioles, and was the AL president from 1974-83.

"Baseball has been great to our entire family," the elder MacPhail said from Delray Beach, Fla. "Obviously, this is a tremendous feeling. It's a culmination of a lot of years." Rogan, who died in 1967, pitched and played infield and outfield for the Kansas City Monarchs from 1920 to 1938. He had a 113-45 record as a pitcher and a .347 lifetime batting average.

BC, we have to come out with everything on the line against Maine.

"This week has huge significance for us, and we're glad that we still have a chance."

BC will be led by one of the most talented forwards in the nation, a Hobey Baker Award candidate in junior Marty Reasoner. Reasoner has scored 21 goals and 29 assists this season, but he is not alone on the frontline.

Freshman Brian Gionta has put an exclamation mark on his inaugural season with 42 points (23g, 19a), with super sophomores Blake Bellefuille (14g, 13a) and Jeff Farkas (6g, 20a) following behind at a very respectable pace. Add defenseman Mike Mottau to the scoring mix (10g, 29a), and the Minuteman defense has it work cut out for it.

But if anyone can carry the defensive workload, that person is senior goaltender Brian Regan. Regan has regained the form that has placed him into the goalie hierarchy of HE, and he is coming off 38 and 39-save performances against the Terriers last weekend, respectively.

Hasek on a roll; Fedorov a Wing; surprises all over

Simply stated, Dominik Hasek is en fuego.

The Buffalo Sabres netminder has picked up right where he left off before the Olympics. Hasek shut down the Rangers on Monday night and Buffalo is slowly starting to make its charge towards home ice advantage in the playoffs.

The Sabres are currently stationed in seventh place in the Eastern Conference, but will surely be the one team that no one wants to run into, regardless of their seeding.

Michael Kobylanski on the

• Sergei Fedorov is a Detroit Red Wing once again. The Red Wings forward is now millions richer, and has the possibility to make even more should Detroit reach the conference semifinals. The Red Wings were forced to re- sign their Russian superstar after an arbitrator ruled that the offer sheet that was given to Fedorov was in the contest of the collective bargaining agreement.

Detroit put Fedorov back to work as soon as he inked the deal. With the Wings already stationed in the third spot in the Western Conference, Detroit will only be a better team with Fedorov.

• What do Jason Allison of the Bruins, Miroslav Satan of the Sabres, Sami Kapanen of the Hurricanes and Ray Whitney of the Panthers have in common with Pavel Bure, Wayne Gretzky, Jaromir Jagr and Peter Forsberg?

No clue, huh?

Each of these respective players leads his team in scoring. That's pretty sad when jokesters like Satan and Whitney are team leaders in scoring. At least when the Whalers used to be terrible Ron Francis was their leading scorer.

• Shifting gears now to the "Oh, how the mighty have fallen" portion of the program, let's talk about the Panthers and the Canucks.

Florida was a Stanley Cup finalist a few years back. With Doug MacLean and his defensive style of play, the Panthers rode into the finals before falling to Colorado.

So what is the problem, you ask? Well, John Vanbiesbrouck is having a respectable campaign, although his win/loss record doesn't show it. However, a change behind the bench hasn't proved wise for Florida.

The new problem in the Sunshine State, however, is offense. Young guns like Rob Niedermayer and former number one overall pick Ed Jovanoski aren't lighting up opponents. No, instead, it's Whitney who leads the team in scoring, and is followed right behind by Robert Svehla, who happens to be a defenseman. I'm sorry, but the only defensemen who I'm accustomed to seeing the top of a scoresheet have the last names Coffey and Bourque.

As far as Vancouver, I've been through this before. So much talent, but nothing to show for it. The Canucks are dead last in the Western Conference, and are ahead of only Tampa Bay in that department. St. Louis doesn't seem to be regretting their decision to get rid of Mike Keenan now, as Keenan is a cellar dweller, and the Blues are sitting pretty for possible home ice advantage in the playoffs.

• In the department of pleasant surprises, Allison, Bobby Holik and former Bruin Jozef Stumpel are three names that pop up. Allison leads the Black and Gold in scoring and is proving that he is one of the best young players the league has to offer. Holik is a former fourth liner in New Jersey who now leads the Devils in goals and is tied with Doug Gilmour for the team lead in points.

Stumpel is part of L.A.'s youth movement that is starting to pay dividends. The consensus around hockey circles was that the Kings were making a mistake when they got rid of Gretzky a few years back. But that's why there is the cliché, "He who laughs last, laughs best." Who knows, L.A. may just laugh its way into home ice in the first round of the playoffs.

Oh, and in case you were wondering, Gretzky and the Rangers are battling for their playoff lives over in the Eastern Conference.

• In the who gives a rat's behind category, Bret Hedican of the Canucks leads the league in shorthanded assists with five. Former Whaler first rounder Chris Pronger leads the league in plus/minus, and Sergei Zubov leads the league in power play assists with 22.

Just like the end of an episode of SportsCenter, I bet that that was something that you did not know.

Minutemen to face Hokies in A–10 quarters

By Luke Meredith
Collegian Staff

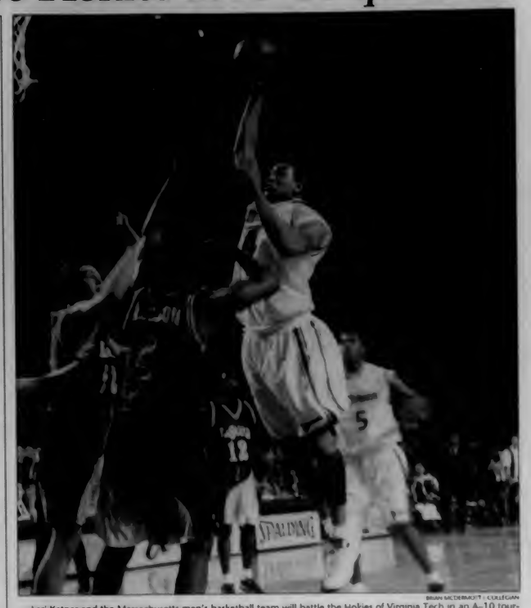
It's a dilemma the Minutemen put themselves in.

After a season of setting the Atlantic 10 on its ear, a late season slide has left the No. 23 Massachusetts men's basketball team in a position coach Bruiser Flint didn't want to be in — an opening round matchup in the Atlantic 10 tournament at 2 p.m. today against the West No. 6 seed Virginia Tech at the CoreEstates Spectrum in Philadelphia (WHMP 99.3 FM, WMUA 91.1 FM).

A lethargic week made both the A-10 regular season title and a first round bye go "bye–bye" for Massachusetts (20–9, 12–4 A–10), and now the Minutemen have to win four games, not three, to win an A–10 title.

The Hokies have suffered through a rebuilding season, and come in at 10–16, 5–11 in the Atlantic 10. UMass won the lone meeting this season, 68–59, back on Jan. 24.

Senior forward Tyrone Weeks led the Minutemen with 15 points and 11 rebounds in that game, but he will not be available for today's contest. The senior forward will sit out the game with a sprained ankle and is listed in day–to–day condition. Lari Ketner and Monty Mack had 14 points, and Ajmal Basit turned in one of his stronger performances of the season with 10 points in only 12 minutes.



Provided the Minutemen get past the Hokies, the road to winning the A–10 tournament is now much tougher following Sunday's loss at Temple. The winner of today's game will face George Washington (22–7, 11–5 A–10) tomorrow at 2:30 p.m. Last season, the Colonials ended UMass' five–year stranglehold on the A–10 with a 58–49 win in the quarterfinals.

The other match–ups in UMass' bracket include La Salle (9–17, 5–11 A–10) against St. Joseph's (10–16, 3–13 A–10) at noon, with the winner facing A–10 regular season champion Temple (20–7, 13–3) in the quarterfinals. In the other bracket, St. Bonaventure (16–13, 6–10) plays Duquesne (11– 18, 5–11) at 7 p.m. for the right to face West No. 1 Xavier in the quarterfinals, and Fordham (6–20, 2–14) and Dayton (19–10, 11–5) round out tonight's action at 9 p.m., with the winner to play Rhode Island.

This is the second season the tournament will be held in the Spectrum, after one season in the Philadelphia Civic Center. Before that, the A–10 championship game was held on the site of the highest remaining seed. The last time it was held on campus sites was in 1995, when UMass beat Temple, 63–44, in the William D. Mullins Center. Lou Roe ended that season not only as A–10 Player of the Year, but as a four–year member of the A–10 All–Championship team.

No matter the results of the A–10 tournament, the Minutemen seem in position for their seventh straight NCAA bid, and their eight overall. Their RPI index ranking is 17th, highest of all A–10 teams. Temple is 22nd, followed by Rhode Island at 27th, Xavier at 37th and George Washington at 40th.

Despite dropping out of the AP poll (UMass is 26th), the Minutemen are still No. 23 in the USA Today/ ESPN coaches poll. The team with the most to gain during the tournament seems to be Dayton. Despite an 11–5 record in the A–10 and a 19–10 overall mark, a low RPI rating has the Flyers on the bubble. With GW, URI, Temple, UMass and Xavier in good standing for a bid, Dayton will have to have a strong showing to convince the NCAA tournament committee to give out six bids to the A–10, something it has never done.

Playoffs on the line as Eagles visit Mullins

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts hockey team must fly like an Eagle as it faces No. 7 Boston College tonight at the William D. Mullins Center, or the Minutemen's postseason hopes might sink in the sea. This game is the makeup date for the postponed Jan. 23 game, and it will truly make up what the Minutemen will or will not do the rest of the season.

With two games left, UMass (6–23–2, 3–18–1 in Hockey East) is on the verge of either clinching a postseason conference berth or letting it slip through its fingers. The Minutemen are one point behind Merrimack College in the HE standings for the final conference playoff spot — with a game in hand — while the Warriors have the unenviable task of travelling to No. 3 Boston University this Sunday for the regular season finale.

UMass dropped two games to the Terriers this past weekend, but the immediate task at hand is what to do with an equally dangerous BC squad (21–8–4, 14–5–3 in HE). However, not only will the Minutemen have to face the Eagles this week, but a tough Maine team will come to town this Saturday night (7 p.m.).

One thing on UMass' side is that Merrimack has imploded the last month and a half, not winning a game since Jan. 17 (a 6–4 win over the Minutemen), while the administration has already announced coach Ron Anderson will not return next season. If the Warriors do not pull off the upset of No. 3 BU, then two ties will work for UMass, or in true clinching fashion, a win will be the best thing for the job.

The Minutemen will have their hands full in their attempt to secure a playoff spot. UMass coach Joe Mallen is glad to still be in the playoff race, but he will be much more glad if his team can jump Merrimack for that playoff spot.

"Despite our record, it is great to still be involved and have a chance to play in the playoffs," Mallen said. "These two games for us have a high motivation factor, and are real important for our guys. If we beat BC, then we have to still go out and beat Maine. But if we don't beat

Lots of surprises on All A–10 teams

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

There were some surprises in store for those at the Atlantic 10 men's basketball banquet held in Philadelphia.

Sure, there were also some obvious choices, such as Tyson Wheeler of Rhode Island and Ryan Perryman of Dayton University making the first team All A–10.

Everyone knew that Massachusetts' Mike Babul would have a spot on the All–Defensive team, and that Monty Mack would surely find his way onto the All–Rookie Team.

But the biggest surprise of the night may have been when Rhode Island's Cuttino Mobley was named the A–10 player of the year. Mobley was not even named to a preseason team, but obviously impressed the conference coaches with his strong play throughout the season, and claimed the award.

The coach of the year award went to Dayton's Oliver Purnell. After posting a 13–14 mark in 1996–97, the Flyers are on the NCAA tournament bubble, and may get a bid if they have a strong A–10 tournament showing.

The Rookie of the Year went to Fordham's Bevon Robin, while Temple's Pepe Sanchez took home the A–10 Defensive Player of the Year award.

Other winners were Dayton's Coby Turner, who won the Chris Daniels award as the league's most improved player, and James Posey of Xavier, who earned the Sixth Man award.

The Minutemen were well represented on all of the squads. Lari Ketner was named first–team All A–10, while Charlton Clarke was named to the third team. The Bronx, N.Y. native made a strong push late in the season, and led St. Joseph's coach Phil Martelli to say that Clarke would be his choice for A–10 player of the year.

After accepting his award, Ketner said he thought Clarke deserved his spot, while Clarke insisted teammate Tyrone Weeks belonged in his position.

Babul, who also was a candidate for defensive player of the year, made the All–Defensive team as well as the All–Academic team. Mack, who was also a candidate for the rookie of the year, was named to the All–Rookie team.

The first team was comprised of Lamont Barnes of Temple, Mike James of Duquesne, Ketner, Mobley, Perryman, and Wheeler.

Second team recipients were Rashid Bey of St. Joe's, Lenny Brown of Xavier, Posey, Shawnta Rogers of George Washington, and Darnell Williams of Xavier.

The third team consisted of La Salle's Donnie Carr, Clarke, Gary Lumpkin of Xavier, Yegor Mescherlakov of George Washington, Rashaan Palmer of St. Bonaventure, and Sanchez.

Named to the All–Rookie team were Mike King of George Washington, Mack, Robin, Rolan Roberts of Virginia Tech, Tony Stanley of Dayton, and Quincy Wadley of Temple.

In addition to Babul, Barnes, Caswell Cyrus of St. Bonaventure, Rogers, and Sanchez, made the All–Defensive team.

The All–Academic team was made up of Babul, Alexander Koul of George Washington, Chris Lumsdon of St. Bonaventure, Sanchez, and Mescheriakov.

Former Nicaraguan pres. accused of abuse

MANAGUA, Nicaragua (AP) — In a public letter that surprised the nation yesterday, Daniel Ortega's stepdaughter accused the former Nicaraguan president of sexual abuse that she said began when she was 11 and lasted for years.

Ortega said the accusations were causing him great pain, and his wife said they were false. "We want to treat this as a family matter," Rosario Murillo said at a news conference, standing next to her husband.

The accusation, published in a newsletter and read over radio and television stations, caused an immediate commotion. Dozens of people called into the country's main radio station to express their shock.

The stepdaughter, Zoilamerica, 30, is Murillo's child from a previous marriage, and Ortega adopted her.

Although she has always used the last name Ortega, she said in her letter that she would now take the name of her biological father, Jorge Narvaez, who is dead.

Zoilamerica told The Associated Press that the letter was authentic but said she didn't want to elaborate on it now.

Castrated sex felon gets 26-year sentence

GENEVA, Ill. (AP) — An admitted child molester who had himself surgically castrated in hopes of getting a lighter prison term was sentenced yesterday to 26 years in prison for molesting two girls. He could have gotten nearly 100 years.

Judge Donald Hudson noted that 30-year-old Jeffrey Morse waited "until the gates of the penitentiary were closing in on him" before he was castrated. Hudson also said he wanted to keep the threat of a stiff sentence as a deterrent to other child molesters. "I chose not to lose the threat of a longer sentence and its deterrence because the defendant wants to use his body parts as a bargaining chip," the judge said.

Morse, who pleaded guilty to aggravated criminal sexual assault and three other charges, could have been sentenced to almost 100 years for molesting two girls, ages 8 and 12.

Prosecutor Kathy Diamond Karayannis asked for a sentence of 25 to 60 years and called Morse's castration a ploy to evoke sympathy and get a lighter sentence.

"He had control over these victims," she said. "Do not let him get control over this court, too."

Defense attorney Paul Wharton urged the judge to impose a lighter sentence, possibly even the minimum six-year term, calling Morse "the safest sex offender in the United States today." "Jeff Morse has made himself as non-dangerous a pedophile as a pedophile can be," he said.

SGA candidates debate Jewish student issues

By Bryan Schwartzman
Collegian Staff

For nearly two hours Tuesday, nine of the 13 candidates for Student Government Association (SGA) president and trustee presented their platforms and fielded questions and concerns from the University of Massachusetts Jewish community.

The candidates addressed the Jewish Student Union at the Hillel House and responded to concerns about funding for Hillel programs, final exams on Saturdays, and Jewish representation in student government.

> "[If I were a Jewish student] I would not want exams on Saturday anymore than I want them on Sunday"
> – Senator Amy Pellegrino

Funding

The Jewish Student Union (formerly the Hillel Council) is a Registered Student Organization (RSO) which represents the campus Jewish population, and received $9,000 from SGA for this fiscal year.

"The Black Student Union represents 900 students and receives $8,500 from the SGA. It's almost a given that Hillel, who represents 3,000 students should receive more," said Salwa Shamapande, presidential candidate.

Shamapande said he rarely goes two weeks without seeing a poster for a Hillel/Jewish Student Union sponsored event and is impressed with the kind of programming that is done.

Senator Amy Pellegrino (Orchard Hill, Grayson), presidential candidate, is currently on the SGA Ways and Means committee and said, "we're going to take a hard look at what RSO's are doing, those who are not spending their money wisely will not get the same funding again."

Candidate Jesse Burchfield said it was important to keep in mind that an increase in funding means that funds are being diverted from another RSO.

"The president can be an advocate but [funding] is essentially a Senate issue... within the Senate, everything is inherently political," Burchfield said.

Southwest Senator–At Large Jennifer Casasanto said, "Ways and Means has historically been discriminatory towards Hillel."

Casasanto, a presidential candidate, said that Hillel, one of the largest RSOs on campus should not have to share office space with MassPIRG and the UMass Theatre Guild, also huge organizations.

Jewish Student Union President Louisa Shein, who introduced the candidates, said that Hillel had a difficult time convincing SGA of their need for office space since there is the Hillel House on North Pleasant Street in Amherst.

Shein said that having an office in the Student Union provides a vital link to other RSOs and the rest of campus.

Route 9 construction discussed

Committee opposes Wal-Mart, cinema multiplex development

By Samantha Poulten
Collegian Staff

Those who regularly travel from Amherst to Northampton at 3 p.m. on a weekdays know commuters would be wise to allot extra time to get through the thick traffic on Route 9.

The stretch of Route 9 from Amherst through Hadley and into Northampton is one of the busiest roads in the area, with traffic often backed up from the bridge going into Northampton to the Burger King in Hadley.

Concern has risen that traffic may become even more congested if the town of Hadley decides to increase construction on Route 9. The Town Planning Board is currently deciding if it will go ahead with a plan to build a Wal–Mart and a 20–cinema multiplex in the area.

Residents of Hadley feel building more on Route 9 is not needed, and that it will only add to the increasing traffic problem.

A group of residents have formed the Hadley First Committee, made up of business people and volunteers who believe Route 9 is built up enough already.

"We don't need this overcommercialization in Hadley," said Tonya Thomas, an on–and–off lifetime resident of Hadley and founder of the First Committee.

Students hold protest, demand Suharto's ouster

By Christopher Torchia
Associated Press

JAKARTA, Indonesia — Thousands of banner–waving university students demanded President Suharto's ouster yesterday — the largest display of anger yet over the economic crisis that has Indonesia in an upheaval.

The protests came as the United States and other foreign lenders stepped up the pressure on Suharto to carry out reforms they consider crucial to rescuing the economy — reforms that could undercut much of Suharto's power and wealth.

"Hang Suharto!" shouted protesters in the Java island city of Yogyakarta, circling their campus on scooters under the scrutiny of hundreds of police and plainclothes officers.

Students also rallied in several other cities on Java as well as on Sulawesi, another of Indonesia's larger islands.

Five people have been killed in riots this year over rising food costs, but yesterday's rallies were peaceful. Confined to campuses, they posed little threat to Suharto, who has resisted calls to overhaul the government he began shaping in the 1960s.

Even as the students protested, delegates to a special assembly were preparing to extend Suharto's 32–year rule. Already Asia's longest–serving leader, the 76–year–old president is almost certain to get a seventh five–year term next week.

However, Suharto is under growing international pressure to carry out economic reforms in exchange for $43 billion bailout by the International Monetary Fund.

The IMF has already handed over $3 billion, but still has not decided whether to grant the second $3 billion installment, due March 15.

The United States, which exerts virtual veto power over the IMF, says Suharto is not moving fast enough on reforms that would remove business perks he, his family and their associates have long enjoyed.

Indonesia says many of the measures, including the slashing of subsidies, are too strict and could provoke more social unrest. But with the deadline nearing, Suharto said yesterday that he had dismantled a string of monopolies in line with the IMF requirements. In a meeting of top economic advisers, he said the government has stripped the state agency

Senate discusses Spring Concert; debates sponsorship

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

A motion concerning Spring Concert occupied the majority of the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) meeting last night.

A motion presented by Senator Dan Backer (commuter at– large) proposed funneling money from various SGA accounts to Students Advocating for Financial Aid (SAFF) which would work in conjunction with a local radio station to fund Spring Concert.

There was much concern over the ability of SAFF, a recently inactive Registered Student Organization (RSO), with two members, to put on Spring Concert.

Senator Jennifer Casasanto (Southwest, at–large) questioned allocating money to an RSO with a membership of two.

"In the history of the SGA has the senate given $50,000 to a defunct RSO with two people in it?" Casasanto said.

Backer felt finding a way to have Spring Concert was worth giving the money to SATF.

"Absolutely this could blow up, as with anything. I don't think it's going to be the greatest spring concert, but it's better than nothing," Backer said.

Speaker of the Senate Peter Kilbourne was concerned that the concert would have a corporate sponsor.

"I don't want 'McConcert.' We have UPC [University Productions & Concerts] and there's a reason we have UPC," Kilbourne said.

However, Senator Paul Ferro (Commuter at–large) felt corporate sponsors are not necessarily bad.

"Everything that has a corporate sponsor is not debasedly evil. A concert with a corporate sponsor is better than no concert at all," Ferro said.

Two concerns about the motion that were not refuted were the constitutionality of the motion and a lack of money in the accounts the motion proposed to take money from.

Kilbourne felt the motion was put together hastily and was not constitu-

Thomas said there is already too much congestion on Route 9, and that building a Wal–Mart and a new multiplex cinema would only add to the increasing congestion.

Jon Carlisle, Director of Public Relations for the Massachusetts Highway Department, said that Route 9 is one of the busiest two-lane highways in the state.

According to Carlisle, the average daily volume of traffic on a portion of Route 9 in Hadley was 77,000 in 1992. Statistics on the volume of cars traveling on the highway are steadily increasing every year.

The First Committee, according to Thomas, feels that the town has no need for a new department store or a huge cinema multiplex therefore, there is no reason for increased traffic.

"How many theaters does this town need? We don't need 20 theaters in Hadley, and we don't need a new department store in addition to the stores already in the Hampshire Mall," Thomas said.

The effect of adding new buildings to the area in Hadley wouldn't only affect Route 9. Side streets such as East Street and South Maple Street will be affected also, according to Thomas.

The overflow of traffic on Route 9 will take the side streets causing increased congestion. Also, residents on these streets will find it increasingly hard to get onto Route 9.

Thomas said even ambulances have a problem getting through the traffic on Route 9 and surrounding streets.

"I've seen ambulances stuck for a long time in traffic, unable to get from Hadley to Northampton," Thomas said. "They honk but no one can move out of the way."

The Hadley First Committee is planning a meeting on March 17 with representatives from Wal–Mart and the town of Hadley. Thomas said anyone is welcome to attend the meeting.

tional under the SGA constitution.

"This is B.S. There are three things unconstitutional in the motion alone," Kilbourne said.

There was a debate to propose a motion to amend the unconstitutional lines, however, due to a loss of quorum, the motion could not be voted on.

Senator Avakian (Southwest, John Adams), Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, said there was not enough money in one of the accounts the motion proposed to use.

"One of the accounts that [the motion] would take $2,000 from, $1,500 of it has already been allocated," Avakian said.

The motion failed.

During the debate Jodi Bailey informed the senate that UPC is having a meeting tomorrow in the SGA office at 3:45 p.m. that will be open to the public to discuss having back–to–back, indoor concerts on the weekend originally planned for Spring Concert.

The other motion discussed during the meeting concerned allocating money to the Vietnamese Student Association.

Senator Brandon Beane (Southwest, Cance) did not support the motion.

"I am opposed to any racially motivated organizations," Beane said.

Despite this, the motion passed by a large majority.

■ SGA

Jewish Students have advocated that University final exams should not be administered on Friday afternoons or Saturdays since it interferes with Shabat, the Jewish day of rest. Last year, the Senate passed a motion to end final exams on Saturday, but the proposal was rejected by Chancellor Scott.

"[If I were a Jewish Student] I would not want the exams on Saturday any more than I want them on Sunday," Pellegrino said.

Eleanor Court, a trustee candidate who currently serves on the Board of Higher Education, said a high number of students take exams on Friday and Saturday, and the Chancellor probably rejected the proposal because of the extra money required to keep campus open two more days.

Catastanto agreed with Court that a compromise was needed. She suggested doing away with Saturday exams while keeping Friday afternoon but allowing students to make up Friday exams.

Representation

Is there a need for allocated seats for Jewish students in the senate? With questions raised about the number of seats allocated for ALANA students, would the political climate allow for more seat allocations?

"It is highly unlikely... it would be a temporary solution at best," Shamapande said.

Shamapande said it does not seem like anti–Semitism has kept students out of the Senate.

Elections Chancellor Carlos Alvarez said "it would be very easy to have the Jewish community [adequately] represented without having allocated seats."

Alvarez said there are plenty of senate seats still open, both on campus and commuter. Students in the Jewish Living Community, located on the second floor of the Hillel House are considered off campus.

Reactions

Hillel Executive Director Saul Perlmutter said "I was impressed with how much the candidates stayed focused on the issues."

Shamapande said "any chance we get to see students were going to take it."

"It was very informative. I know who I'm going to vote for and who I'm not going to vote for," senior Sharon Herr said.

SGA elections take place Monday–Tuesday, March 9–10.

UMass professor to discuss muscle soreness at lecture; focus on boot camp syndrome

By Aimee Wallis
Collegian Correspondent

Have you ever wondered why it takes 24 hours for muscle soreness to develop?

This afternoon, University of Massachusetts professor Priscilla M. Clarkson will be presenting a lecture on muscle soreness in Herter Hall, room 227.

Many students believe that their muscles are simply 'sore' after a rigorous workout, when in fact they have damaged their muscle fibers. Clarkson will answer questions on how muscles work and why they get sore.

An exercise science professor with a master's degree in marine science and zoology, Clarkson combined her love for dance and her interest in the mechanics of muscles to receive a Ph. D in exercise science. She was recently honored with the 1997 Citation Award by the American College of Sports Medicine and has contributed a book on the Kinesiology of dance with professor Andrea Watkins of the Dance Department.

Clarkson's field of exercise science investigates the relations of exercises to muscle damage. She has studied a variety of everyday exercises to the design of exercise programs used in space.

In Clarkson's lecture she will talk about exercises that cause damage to muscle fibers.

"Exercises that produce soreness are usually those where the muscles lengthen as they produce force — like lowering a weight. Running down hill causes more soreness than running uphill," Clarkson said.

Clarkson will discuss "Boot Camp Syndrome" which affects men and women in the army and military who are forced to do strenuous exercises for long amounts of time, day after day. Over time, this syndrome can leave permanent damage to the muscle fibers.

Besides teaching and lecturing, Clarkson is currently working with the NCAA in exploring the recent deaths of three college wrestlers and is searching for the links between dehydration and muscle damage. One of the three wrestlers was found to have severe muscle damage, often caused when one tries to lower their body weight quickly.

Bulog of all trade controls except for a rice monopoly.

Presidential spokesman Murdiono, who attended the meeting, quoted Suharto's remarks on reform.

Indonesia's worst economic turmoil in three decades began when the currency, the rupiah, plunged in value last year, pushing up prices and unemployment in the nation of 202 million.

Protesters said Suharto is to blame.

"Suharto is the mastermind of the crisis," said Pedro Viera, a student at the prestigious Gadjah Mada University in Yogyakarta, 310 miles east of Jakarta.

The Yogyakarta students also appealed for the government to take action against ethnic violence. Chinese merchants, a minority who dominate commerce in Indonesia, have been targeted in the riots over soaring food prices.

Human rights groups accuse the government of doing little to protect the Chinese, although Suharto warned against scapegoating in a speech last weekend.

In Surabaya, another Java city, seven university students entered the second day of a hunger strike.

Police blocked a small group of protesters from leaving the campus at a state university in Bandung, near Jakarta. In the capital, students also marched at an Islamic university.

Several thousand people demonstrated at a teaching institute in Ujungpandang on Sulawesi island, northeast of the capital. In Jakarta, three women who had been arrested in an anti-government protest went on trial yesterday. More than 100 people crowded a district court for a hearing in the case of Gadis Arivia and Karlina Leksono, both feminist editors and philosophy lecturers, and Wularsih, a housewife.

They were arrested Feb. 25 after waving posters on a main plaza to protest the government's management of the economy. The women face one week in jail if convicted.

Authorities have imposed a ban on political rallies in Jakarta, hoping to keep the peace during the March 1-11 assembly expected to renominate Suharto. The 1,000-member People's Consultative Assembly is dominated by Suharto supporters.

Ignorance is not bliss

On Feb. 22, someone threw a rock through the window of the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) office in the Student Union. When I walked by, a big sheet of cardboard covered where the window once was and various graduate students and maintenance men milled around, taking measurements or talking. The scene reminded me of the rock that was thrown through the window of my car on the last day of exams last year, forcing me to drive home five hours with a big sheet of plastic taped across my back window. It wasn't something I needed after a hard semester, and I'm pretty sure the GEO doesn't need this monkey crawling onto their back, what with their problems with this University.

Michael Messaros

Throwing a rock through a window is a loud angry cry of rage, maybe despair, that translates to, "Uh... I really just don't have much to say." It's an impotent, puerile and stupid reaction to feelings that cannot be intelligibly expressed. You don't like the GEO? You don't like their protests? Fine. Write a letter. You have the ability to make your voice be heard, but instead we get crap like this. Good job, guys.

GEO is a group that is getting spit on by the administration and now it's spit on by a small part of the student body. However small this faction is, though, it's the one that made the most impact and the one that was heard. Unfortunately, the stupidest voice is usually the loudest, and this is what is heard. This is the same voice that throws garbage cans into the pond or sprays graffiti on the dorms. This is the same voice that sends Amherst (the town and the college) into lock-down whenever it snows a bit.

> We are a school devoid of a strong identity and community.

We are a school devoid of a strong identity and community. A good amount of the messages sent out about what we are is negative. Ever wonder why we are trashed by the Boston Globe and other media outlets? Look at what we have to say for ourselves. Look at what is being presented not just by the administration in it's handling of the negotiations with graduate students, but how the students themselves act. It's not a pretty picture that we are painting. It's a picture that lacks pride.

I remember someone writing a while ago about the people of Amherst complaining about students urinating all over town. The basic response was, they should get used to it, this is a college town. What!? They should get used to it? It seems that this is the answer to everything around here. We live in a four-year bizarro world where real world actions and proper ways of living are disbanded in favor of some more animalistic reactions. Rocks through windows? Yes. Peeing in public? Absolutely. How can we be taken seriously, not only in the Five College area, but state and nation wide, if we accept things like that and expect the world to smile and say, "Oh, those wacky UMass students!"?

The rock through the window is just another in a long line of wrong messages sent out by members of this University. The finger should be pointed not only at the student body, but also at the administration for letting it go this far. We live in an environment that seems to incubate and nurture such feelings by the administration not promoting any sort of positive identity, ignoring campus needs and removing themselves from the students. The administration lets problems go for long periods of time, thereby showing off tangible signs of disrespect and by default, accepting them.

We are a school that wants to be taken seriously. I can hear it. The problem is, nothing is being done in order to change. The power is there, and certainly there are enough people who want to proud of this school. I really don't know why the people threw the rock. Maybe I'm reading into this way too much. Maybe this is just another case of having way too much cheap beer on another weekend at UMass. Regardless, the implications are there, and we certainly do have an all too voluble history of stupidity and dumb reactions here.

I know there are some of us here who try to better ourselves and to carry ourselves with at least a modicum of dignity. The problem is, the only voices being heard in this school are the ones that aren't saying a thing. At least, not anything worth being heard.

Life in Lake Wobegon

I was watching TV the other day, and I saw a commercial for the six o'clock news. I'm not sure which station it was, but you know the type of commercial: the ones that go on and on about the station's dedication to bringing you, the viewer, the best news in town and its four-day, super- doppler, constantly updated, never-wrong weather forecast.

This particular commercial was a little different from most. Usually, stations play up to their hard-hitting news stories. They give their investigative journalism teams names like "The I-Team," and "Captain Journalism's Action News Squad." They want you to know that when you turn to their broadcast, you'll be getting more hard truth than you could shake a stick at. But the commercial I was watching didn't go that route. Instead, it promised that every night, the six o'clock news would have at least one story about something uplifting.

Mark Shea

It was pathetic. In between clips of the news team talking about how it was important to make people feel good, the commercial took it to the streets, showing footage of average citizens talking about how they were sick and tired of depressing news all the time. Watching these idiots complain that the news was too upsetting and demanding a more life-affirming news report had to be one of the most disturbing things I've ever seen.

> Whatever the reason, the station didn't promise more important news to its viewers; it promised happier news.

Now, I'm not saying the people complaining that the news was depressing were completely wrong. The nightly news is basically a catalogue of all the most spectacular tragedies and scandals of the day, and it does seem to focus on only the lowest aspects of human nature. I just can't see how changing it from sordid and meaningless to cheery and meaningless improves anything. I am just as indifferent to the heart-warming story of the courageous one-legged kayaker who didn't let the loss of a limb steal his love for the sport as I am to sportscasters' deviant sexual practices or presidents' moral breaches.

But you can blame this switch to happy news on the station. If they didn't think anyone would watch it, then they wouldn't be putting out sugar-coated news. If we believe the supposedly unrehearsed and unsolicited interviews in the commercial, then there is a portion of the population that truly don't want to know what's going on if it makes them uneasy.

Whether the public demand for chipper news is real or was created by the station is immaterial. Whatever the reason, the station didn't promise more important news to its viewers; it promised happier news. We should be insulted that such an idea has even been considered. It makes us look like infants crying for pacifiers: "I don't want to be told what's going on. I don't want to face the world like an adult. I just want someone to tell me that everything is okay so I can go about my daily routine."

This is not the way it's supposed to be. The media is supposed to inform the public on what is happening in the world so we can act on that information. The First Amendment was created to insure that this sanitation of the news would never occur. Our sacred popular elections are empty and meaningless if the voters have no grasp of reality. When we say we want only happy news, we say that we would prefer to go about blind because reality is too frightening; we pawn the high ideals of the Constitution for a warm sense of security.

Perhaps I'm overreacting. I'd like to think that we as a nation are still smart enough to see what this sorry excuse for journalism really is. I believe that most people want to know what's going on, not to be told in soothing tones to go back to sleep, everything's still fine.

We should want to know what's wrong in the world so we can move to fix it. The day that we decide we would rather doze peacefully in front of the television than face difficult facts is the day that we resign ourselves to society's failure. It's a day I never even imagined until I saw those damn fools on that commercial.

Letters to the Editor

Concessions from both sides made agreement possible

To the editor:

It is understandable that Chancellor Scott and his administration at the University must try to save face coming out of these negotiations with the Graduate Employee Organization. By breaking off talks and declaring impasse on Feb. 12, they were making a bold statement that they would not budge at the table. Now that a tentative agreement has been reached, they have a vested interest in claiming that they have conceded nothing. This is a standard ploy: try to paint the union as ineffectual, thereby eroding members' involvement in the future.

Aside from the ironies this stance implies (notably, that the University is "victorious" when it gives as little to its employees as possible), and aside from belying the administration's attempted intransigence, it is worth noting some of the ways in which the University has moved.

As someone who participated in approximately 27 hours of mediation last Thursday and Friday, I feel that I have a decent sense of the document that I signed and the movement that the administration made. Since 1991, and until entering mediation, the administration has steadfastly refused to guarantee wage increases for all graduate employees. The package that the Chancellor attempted to unilaterally impose last month would have denied over 1,000 employees a guaranteed increase. The current agreement includes just such a guarantee for all employees.

The administration also attempted to shut down talks over access to education, claiming that they would dedicate no further resources to expanding access. Part of the mediated settlement, however, does include greater resources to this end; the University will fund a half-time position in the Development Office to do fund-raising on diversity issues. Chancellor Scott also tried to eviscerate the Union by only funding two permanent staff positions to administer the contract, handle grievances, and provide services to over 2,000 employees. The current agreement provides for four permanent positions, two of them year-round.

Did GEO make concessions within mediation? Absolutely. Personally, I was not happy about some of the proposals that GEO was forced to give up, but movement is always necessary in order to achieve a settlement that both sides can live with. We will be back at the table in less than a year, and we will then continue to build on the improvements made in this contract: improvements like a 45 percent increase in the minimum wage, a doubling of funding for diversity, funding for childcare brought from zero to $500,000, e-mail waivers if its use is employment-related, a 50 percent increase in personal time off, and many other benefits.

Support UPC to make Spring Concert a success

To the editor:

As a student and the Student Government Association (SGA) Public Relations Secretary, I would like to explain a few things I feel have been missing in the recent debate about University Productions and Concerts (UPC) and Spring Concert.

Historically, UPC was guaranteed money in the Student Activities budget to put on quality programs in the Student Union Ballroom as well as the Spring Concert. However, that sum has been halved, as the costs have tripled. Under constant attack by students, as well as the SGA who funds them, for poor performance, UPC's membership has dwindled into practically nothing. Campus Activities has known about this important issue for quite some time.

At their last general meeting, where posters all over campus said this was a make it or break it time for Spring Concert, four of 18,000 undergraduates showed up to express interest. At the last SGA meeting and in conversations since, UPC has stated that funding in only half of the issue: genuine support from students is the other half. UPC currently lacks the staff and infrastructure to hold an event like Spring Concert.

This Tuesday (March 3), John Peters of MassConcerts explained to students how he could "save" Spring Concert for $70,000. Besides the legal restrictions put in a place to protect unions, student groups and student businesses, this offer poses a significant risk in terms of education. UPC trains and educates students on the fundamentals of running a concert promotional group. This is akin to telling People's Market they aren't doing a good enough job and instead opting for Dairy Mart or Dunkin' Donuts to sell coffee and bagels here.

As a student, I would like to see more money given to UPC to have Spring Concert done right. I'm probably one of a handful who remember the Wailers, Beastie Boys and Dinosaur, Jr. onstage, not to mention Belly, Radiohead and Rage against the Machine in the Student Union Ballroom. Back then, the SGA and the student body supported the efforts of UPC. They were involved. That's what I ask of SGA senators and students to do now. Don't take the easy road and sell out to private enterprise. Invest your energy into making the UMass Spring Concert great again. Get involved.

A literary look at college basketball

Looking for a more intellectual way to approach this year's NCAA men's basketball tournament? Fear not, we can help.

Literary tomes abound about not just the tournament, but the college basketball world in general, and the Collegian can help you sort through the good, the bad, the should-never-have-been-printed.

• A March to Madness by John Feinstein looks at several teams in one season from an outsider's view. Feinstein could be the most recognized sports author right now. This is his most recent foray into sports book writing, and it is one of his more ambitious efforts.

In Dean Smith's final season, Feinstein takes a stroll through the Atlantic Coast Conference, focusing mostly on the league's coaches.

Bear in mind when reading this that Feinstein is a Duke grad, and if you didn't know that going in, you will by the end. Also, reality doesn't always make the best story, and last season's sensation was Arizona.

• Going Bigtime by Marty Dobrow (one team, one season, outsider's view) — This local author's look at not only the Final Four season of 1995-96 but also the history of the UMass basketball program in general is one of the best college hoop books in recent history.

Bigtime is rich in historical content and human interest. And in focusing attention on the past and the present, it can make the reader aware of just how incredible everything that has happened on campus the past 10 years really is.

• Fab Five by Mitch Albom (one team, one season, outsider's view) — Like 'em or hate 'em, the gloriously flamboyant Wolverine fiveosome forever changed the world of college basketball.

Albom, a writer for the Detroit Free Press, tackles the ambitious task of defining these ever-changing role models of a new generation of fans. In doing so he actually makes these five rebels look like kids, something so many people forgot in the Fab Five's heyday.

Vitale-ogy

In its April 1994 issue, GQ magazine had an article that read, "Two thirds of the earth is covered by water, mostly from the oceans. The rest is covered by hot air, mostly from Dick Vitale."

One of college basketball's most recognizable icons, Vitale brings incredible enthusiasm to his job. Though some may argue with his approach (criticisms run the gamut from his over-hyping of so many different players to his obvious rooting for the ACC), his mannerisms and outlandish style have made him incredibly popular.

Of course, to love Vitale is to understand him, and that's not always so easy. The man has, after all, invented a language of his own. So here's a little Vitale-to-English dictionary to help you through the rough spots.

Marlon Wayans stars as Kenny Tyler in the hoop film The Sixth Man.

If you want to keep the college basketball action going non-stop throughout the month of March, but don't want to get involved with one of the 300-pagers what with midterms and all, have no fear. You can rent plenty of movies about basketball, although they aren't all about college hoops. Here's a look:

Hoosiers— Quite possibly the best basketball movie ever made, Hoosiers ranks up with Field of Dreams in terms of great sports films.

It stars Gene Hackman as the reluctant coach of a tiny high school basketball team in a hoop-hungry Indiana town eager to win.

There is something truly beautiful about the way Hackman transforms not only his team but the townspeople into believers of his system.

Hoop Dreams— A documentary about the lives of Arthur Agee and William Gates, this film won critical acclaim from the monsent it was released.

The story is engaging in large part because of the striking similarities and differences in the lives of the subjects. The filmmakers, who followed the two throughout their prep careers, present an honest, emotional portrait of these two Chicago teenagers.

Blue Chips— This thinly veiled portrait of Bob Knight would have worked better if it were never, ever, ever, ever made. Ever. Really.

Come on. The producers should have used real actors rather than professional athletes and Nick Nolte.

The 6th Man— Massachusetts men's basketball coach Bruiser Flint made his silver screen debut in this Marlon Wayans vehicle last summer.

Of course, you have to know going in that some of the premises in this movie require at least a small leap of faith. I mean, not only does the ghost of a player helps the team win, but, the University of Washington wins the national championship, over our beloved Minutemen.

White Men Can't Jump— Okay, so this isn't in quite the same genre that the others are. The focus is street ball, not organized collegiate hoop. But Wesley Snipes and Woody Harrelson do put on a basketball show — mixed with a little crime, money and women.

Of course there are other movies out there that have something to do with basketball, although it may not be the main focus. Above the Rim focuses more on gang violence than hoops, while Leonardo DiCaprio's character has more to worry about than jump shots in The Basketball Diaries. And of course, Michael J. Fox was a standout when the moon came out, but he was dealing with some non- basketball issues as well in Teen Wolf.

And of course, the greatest cameo in a movie by anyone associated with basketball- Jerry Tarkanian in Honeymoon in Vegas.

Panthalassa reconstructs Miles Davis

On March 24, Blue Note releases Shirley Eikhard's debut jazz album entitled Going Home.

Eikhard has been singing jazz since 1976, and since meeting Hal David of the famed writing duo of Bacharach/David, she has written music recorded by Anne Murray, Chet Atkins, Emmylou Harris and the Pointer Sisters. Her most notable composition is Bonnie Raitt's Grammy-winning "Let's Give Them Something to Talk About."

Unfortunately, Eikhard's solo debut is undeserving of similar accolades.

The opening "Desperately" is a sultry song about longing and feels like a James Bond theme, cheesy and somewhat contrived, but nevertheless, the only reasonably well-done track on this CD. Eikhard follows this up with a series of overproduced, overly-dramatic, Barbara Streisand rip-off tracks that make the listener cringe the louder or more overdubbed her voice becomes.

This theme of overdone compositions is exemplified by "Disciples of Cain," which feature synthesizer-produced orchestral back-ups and lyrics that are far-fetched and nonsensical. The instrumental finale, "Going Home," is also overdone.

Although Eikhard has a good volce, her debut attempts to be grandiose and falls flat.

Vance Gilbert's latest Rounder release, Shaking Off Gravity, contains some interesting lyrics and a varied repertoire of backing instruments, but the singer/songwriter's overall performance is nothing new on the folk/blues/storyteller front.

"The Hey Lah Dee Dah Song" opens the CD sounding a lot like James Taylor in an upbeat fact-of-the-matter style talking about the simple problems of everyday living. Eventually, Gilbert evolves from James Taylor into Don MacLean with "Charlene," "Icarus By Night" and "Oh Little Town" during the second half of the CD, making it sound weak and redundant.

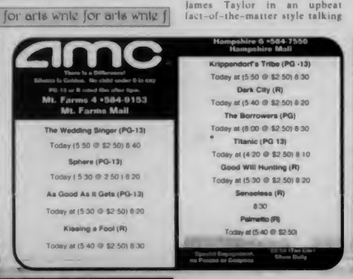
The best track is "Bringing Down the House of Pain," featuring a very cool slide guitar and coming off as inspirational — it sounds gospel-influenced.

Gilbert's voice is soulful and urgent on this CD at times, but it is also too technically precise and almost nerdy in some places. The second half of this CD is tedious, but it could be a keeper for those enamored with '70s folk singers.

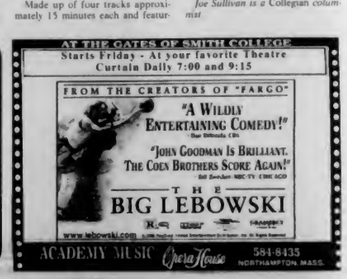
Rarely does a CD come along that absolutely destroys the established practices and outright blows the listener's mind in one sitting, but the January-released Panthalassa (Columbia), a reconstruction of Miles Davis' music, 1969- 1974, can only be described as mind-blowing.

Made up of four tracks approximately 15 minutes each and featuring endless changes, the CD was pieced together by producer, Bill Laswell, from Davis' In A Silent Way (1969), On The Corner (1972), and Get Up With It (1974), and the idea is free-flow, free-form experimentation.

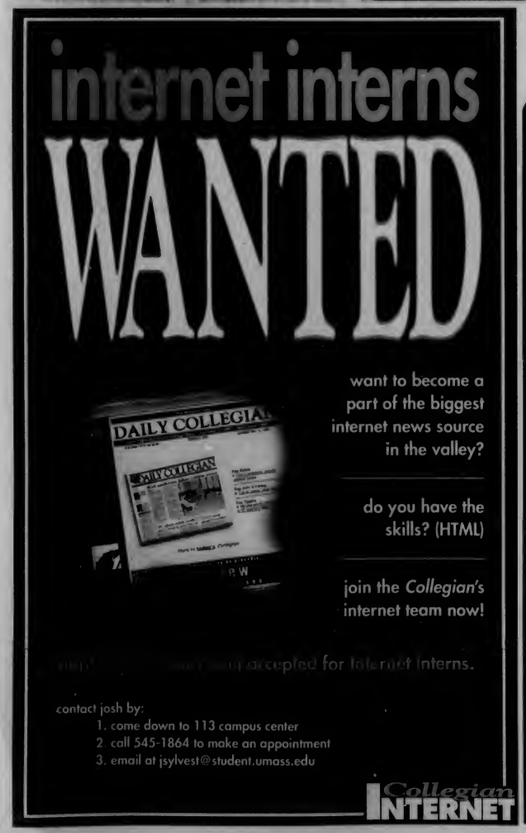
The first opus, "In A Silent Way/Shhh/Peaceful/It's About That Time," opens sounding like an interpretation of the universe forming until the seventh minute when the rhythm picks up. Miles shirks in with his droopy trumpet riffs and an organ backing him, and then the track makes another change to a grooving soprano sax backed by organ and drums that might scare the purists.



"Black Satin/Pete Cosey/Agharta Prelude Dub" features Indian percussion and sitar accompaniment that breaks into an electric funk with Davis' trumpet hooked up to a wah- wah peddle. The keyboard effects on this track are sinister and reminiscent of an old science fiction movie, and the background clapping is pure insanity and discombobulation.



The final two tracks, "Rated X/Billy Preston" and "He Loved Him Madly," continue the trip this CD puts you on, as the former places the listener in the jungle music of New York City clubs, and the latter is like In A Gadda Da Vida all over again.



Though not a traditional jazz recording, Panthalassa must be possessed. It's like giving birth and being killed at the same time Simply wonderful.

not exactly a favorable omen. In fact, it's a momentum and, more importantly, a confidence killer.

6. Experience counts.

Steve Fisher's first few games at Michigan were the exception, not the rule. Ed Jucker (Cincinnati, 1961) is the only coach in NCAA history to take a team to the title in his first (full) season as coach.

But that doesn't mean it can't happen. You can usually bet on one coach who has never been there making the Final Four.

Of course, experience is the key. Tournament winners have had an average of over a dozen years experience with their school, more in coaching alone.

7. The top ranked team does not a champion make.

Usually, that is. Although in 1992 Duke became the first team in 10 years to take the No. 1 ranking and translate it into a title.

More than likely, though, you can bet on the top poll vote- getter (entering the tourney, that is) watching the championship game on television.

8. Don't rely on regular season scores too much.

More often than not, the eventual champion has a stinker of a game on its season resume. In 1985-92, the champ had lost at least one game by 12 points or more.

9. If you want a solid-gold sure bet, count on the ACC. The Atlantic Coast Conference will not disappoint come tourney time. A conference team is usually safe for at least an appearance in a regional semifinal, a safe bet for a regional final and not a surprise in the Final Four.

10. Don't pick Syracuse any team with the word George in its name (e.g. Georgia Tech, Georgetown, George Washington, Georgia, George Mason, etc.) or any team with a multi-word directional name (e.g. Southwestern Louisiana, Northern Illinois, etc.) to bring home a ring.

They simply can't get the job done.

Of course, if these tips can't get you started just do what my mom does: Pick the teams with the best colors and mascots. Hey, if it works for her...

Carolina wins national championship. Jacobs was there. Bobby Hurley becomes all-time NCAA assist leader. Jacobs was there. N.C. State suffers at the bottom of the conference, as usual. Jacobs, who might not actually admit he was there, tells the tale.

• Personal Fouls by Peter Goldenbock (one team, several seasons, outsider's view) — If you like Pat Valvano, don't read this book. If you don't like Jimmy V. go ahead, but don't be prepared to change your mind.

• A Season Inside by Feinstein (several teams, one season, outsider's view) — The 1987-88 season in diary form from Feinstein practically leaves the reader with jet lag, considering how many frequent flier miles Feinstein must have racked up.

• Forever's Team by Feinstein (one team, one season, outsider's view) — This one goes back two decades, but it looks at one of the classic cinderellas to ever play in the NCAA tournament, Duke, 1978, national runner-up.

• A Season on the Brink by Feinstein (one team, one season, outsider's view) — This is the book that forever changed the world of sports books. Sure it was a national bestseller for about 800 weeks, But it was this book that gave the nation a real insider- glimpse of Indiana coach Bob Knight.

Knight, not exactly Boy Scout material, was hardly made to look saintly in the Hoosiers' less-than-desirable season certainly didn't help — and (never one to hold a grudge) he and Feinstein haven't exactly been pals since publication 10 years ago.

Feinstein had complete access to Practices and locker rooms and didn't censor anything for his readers.

Brink really paved the way for the flurry of "look at a season" books that came later. And nothing since has had quite the same edge.

• Playing for Knight by Steve Alford (one team, several seasons, player's view) — While playing cards in the Olympic Village in the summer of 1984, Michael Jordan bet Alford $100 he would not last a full four seasons with the volatile Knight as his coach.

In 1987, Alford held the national championship trophy aloft and collected from His Airness. This book is a recollection of those four years, and it actually makes Knight look bearable.

• Refuse to Lose by John Calipari (one team, one season, coach's view) — If you ate up that whole "Refuse ot Lose" slick salesman-type thing that Calipari had going for him, this book will not disappoint. If you enjoy books written above a fourth-grade reading level, or sports books that include actual sports, this may not quite be your bag.

Here's the skinny: Calipari takes the reader through the Final Four season, with glimpses of the monster rebuilding job he did and the tiniest bit of game information. His writing is at times annoying and overly simplistic, but it's always full of his characteristic bottle-it-and-sell-it (ahem...) charm.

Tell the Pulitzer committee to hold on just a sec.

• Full-Court Pressure by Rick Pitino (one team, one season, coach's view) — Think there are some similarities between Calipari and Pitino? Of course there are. But here's a major difference: Pitino writes at a sixth-grade reading level.

This one gives the reader a lovey-huggy glimpse at the early 1990 Kentucky Wildcats. Pitino's earlier book Born to Coach was more revealing and honest, but this one isn't entirely awful.

• A Season is a Lifetime by Mike Krzyzewski (one team, one season, coach's view) — What does it take to build a championship team like Duke? If you take what this book has to offer seriously, a whole lot of Velveeta.

Lifetime, like Refuse and Full-Court, oozes that same we-know-you-love-our-team sap. But we're fans, and we can eat this stuff up without regret or embarrassment, in the privacy of our own homes, of course.

• Big Hoops by Bill Reynolds (several teams, one season, outsider's view) — The Big East back when people actually cared about the Big East. An interesting look, especially now that the former king conference is now struggling to regain its once-mighty standing.

Culture Clash brings snappy humor to Bowker Auditorium

COURTESY NEW WORLD THEATER

Culture Clash will perform this weekend at Bowker Auditorium.

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

The nation's premiere Chicano/Latino comedy trio, Culture Clash will perform their latest show "Radio Mambo: Culture Clash Invades Miami," which has been called wickedly funny as well as cutting edge venture. Ric Salinas, Richard Montoya and Herbert Siguenza, the members of Culture Clash, have been said to be a colorful, snappy and outrageous trio.

With their unique brand of irreverent satire, the group has taken all of America by storm. Presented by the New World Theater, "Radio Mambo" will be performed in Bowker Auditorium on March 7-8 at 8 p.m.

"Radio Mambo," directed by Roger Guenveur Smith, combines a unique brand of socially conscious reporting and real comic entertainment. Culture Clash ventures to represent the diverse and hybrid population of Miami including Haitians, Cubans, Chinese, Jewish, African and Chicanos. After one month of interviewing some of the residents who comprise this diverse community, Culture Clash was able to create a show which provocatively portrays the ethnic array of life in Miami.

Through a series of fast paced vignettes woven together by an infectious Mambo beat, "Radio Mambo" reveals a rich tapestry of diverse ethnicities both rich and poor, young and old, male and female, gay and straight.

This wide range of personalities can include a Cuban refugee drunk on success, a drag queen, a bitter Chinese immigrant or a drug fiend. In any case, the characters of "Radio Mambo" come together to present a comic, compassionate, and perceptive portrait of Miami, encompassing its rich culture and history.

The Miami Herald has called "Radio Mambo" to be "classic Culture Clash: wicked, observant comedy interspersed with keenly acted monologues that make you heart ache."

Culture Clash has also performed at numerous venues including the mark Taper Forum, the South Coast Repertory Theatre, the Joseph Papp Public Theater, Lincoln Center and the Kennedy Center.

One of their earlier plays, A Bowl of Beings premiered on PBS for the Great Performance Series.

Springer, WWF lead parade of trash

Trash television is taking over! As I sat in my room watching the video of "Jerry Springer: Too Hot For TV" that I was begged to bring back to campus from home, I witnessed the amount of people in my dorm room rise to 10 Springer maniacs who were just way too excited for any television show.

What I was trying to figure out was the origin of the extreme infatuation that normal people have with shows like this. Why do they watch this junk? As my research continued, I came up with a number of solutions that try to answer the question of why do we like Jerry?

The first, and most important element to realize about trash television is that it isn't trash! It's obvious that Jerry Springer has studied his viewers' senses, and he appeals to what he has learned.

What talk show hosts such as Springer and Ricki Lake have discovered is that the public has a desire to see things that will shock and offend them. When we look back on the history of television, we really don't see much of this type of offensive material. Of course there have been some things that have shocked us, but let's face it, there has never been anything on television that you can tune in daily, and see something that is so ridiculous that a person just has to keep watching to see what else they have up their sleeves. The hosts realize this, and they plan their shows accordingly.

This brings us to element number two. People have a desire that they may not want to admit, to watch things that make themselves look better. The world has become way too uptight, and when a chance comes along to watch complete screw-ups explain horrible aspects of their lives, the viewing public just jumps at the chance to sit back and watch. It seems like a phenomenon, but it really isn't. The truth that lies here is that it's human nature to have a lust for being better than other people. Let's face it, there aren't many people that are much worse than the wonderful guests on the Jerry Springer show. It's a place where anyone can look to find someone with a worse life, and much worse problems than they can possibly imagine.

The third point in my analysis of these terrific, trashy programs is that in order to realize what Jerry Springer is doing, we have to think like Jerry Springer.

My favorite show on television is "Dennis Miller Live." This is a show that airs Friday nights on HBO. Dennis Miller hosts a normal talk show, and often shows his extreme hatred of the trashy daytime shows. Recently, Miller made a statement about Jerry Springer that I feel sums up the entire perspective on the hosts of trashy shows. He said, "My favorite part of the 'Jerry Springer Show' is Jerry's final thought. Guess what, the only thought that Jerry has is, 'Are the transsexual cousins booked for tomorrow?'"

Miller's quote seems to get to the heart of what all the shows are about. Jerry Springer wants money! The purpose of these shows is to gain viewers, to raise their ratings, to make more money. He doesn't care about analyzing what happens on his show (the final thought). He wants the public to believe that he cares, but he's just doing a really good acting job.

This acting job is the fourth and final point. This is the key to getting the most out of Jerry Springer, Ricki Lake and WWF Wrestling.

Yes, that's right, WWF Wrestling. Now you must be thinking, "Why is he throwing wrestling into the mix?" Jerry Springer is talk show's version of Hulk Hogan. As a viewer, you have to take it for what it is. About 85 percent of "Jerry Springer" is not real!

The wrestlers in the WWF may be quality athletes, but what it comes down to is that everything is planned, and they're just doing a really good (or really poor, depending on how you look at it) acting job.

The guests on "Springer" are usually actors. The show is planned and acted out as a script. Here's something to ponder; "Why aren't the seats on the stage bolted to the ground?" Jerry isn't stupid. He knows that if he invites two men that are dating the same woman, that chairs are going to fly. So why doesn't he bolt them down? He doesn't bolt them down for the same reason that a referee just happens to be looking the wrong way as a wrestler whacks his opponent with a chair. They're not bolted because the people on the stage are actors, and they're acting out a script that they have been hired to perform.

I love Jerry Springer. Obviously I must be a fan because as I mentioned before, I own "Too Hot For TV." I enjoy watching Jerry Springer with my father. Is this wholesome family programming? It definitely is in my house, and I'll bet that in millions of American families it's the same story.

Shifting from trashy TV to trashy acting... "Melrose Place" star Alyssa Milano has decided to leave the show, and she's about to air a Disney movie this weekend on ABC entitled Gold Rush. I'd like to congratulate Disney on hiring such a model citizen and a good role model for kids to look up to. It's always nice to hear that a former adult film star has grabbed the leading role in a film that's endorsed by Mickey Mouse.

The Grammy Awards proved to be no disappointment this past week, as music's biggest night shined for the 44th time. Excellent performances, and great set design came together for a spectacular night. The only thing that really bothered me was the obvious lack of security at the awards show. A member of the Wu-Tang Clan (Ol' Dirty Bastard) rushed the stage when Shawn Colvin was presented with a Grammy for Record of the Year. There was a man who was wearing no shirt, and had "Soy Bomb" painted on his chest. There was clearly a lack of good security at the Grammy's, and that is something that must be changed in the future. Other than this problem, the show proved to be an excellent production.

Saying good–bye to "Seinfeld;" Tara on Grammys & winning

NEW YORK (AP) — To celebrate a show about nothing, Nick at Nite's TV Land will show nothing when the final episode of "Seinfeld" is on.

The cable network, which airs old television shows, will go blank on May 14 from 9 p.m. to 10 p.m., when the final "Seinfeld" is scheduled to air on NBC.

A note will appear on the screen explaining that TV Land will return after the conclusion of "Seinfeld's" finale.

"Nothing is more important than the last episode of 'Seinfeld,'" said Larry Jones, TV Land general manager. "We think airing nothing is a fitting salute to a show about nothing. As 'Seinfeld' is one of the greatest shows ever to air on television, TV Land is honored to pre-empt an hour of programming for this historic and monumental occasion."

Nick at Nite's TV Land, a spinoff channel to Nickelodeon, reaches 27.5 million of that nation's 98 million television households.

A man was convicted yesterday of stalking Steven Spielberg in an alleged plot to rape the filmmaker. The jury decided that 31-year-old Jonathan Norman's two previous felony convictions from a 1995 assault case count against him under California's three-strikes law, which means he could get anywhere from several years in prison to life when he is sentenced April 22. Norman was arrested after he made two attempts to enter Spielberg's home last June and July.

Police said Norman had lists of Spielberg's family members and associates and handcuffs, duct tape and a razor knife. Prosecutors called the equipment a "rape kit" and said Norman wanted to handcuff Spielberg and his wife, actress Kate Capshaw, and make her watch while the director was sexually assaulted.

At the time, Spielberg and his family were in Ireland, where he was making a movie. He said he was contacted and ordered beefed-up security around his family, including his mother, who lives in Los Angeles.

Spielberg, 50, told the jury that he has suffered from nightmares and fears for his family ever since he learned of Norman's plot.

He said he was at first reluctant to become involved in a court case but decided he had no choice because he wanted to protect his family.

Tara Lipinski was wearing a diamond necklace she'd borrowed for the evening, not her Olympic gold medal. Her ice skates were nowhere in sight.

She wasn't on center ice in Nagano, Japan, but standing on stage at Radio City Music Hall, looking incredibly tiny at 4 feet 11 inches, especially when surrounded by the four members of the soul group, Boyz II Men.

Tara Lipinski, girl singer?

No, not really.

The Olympic gold-medal winner for women's figure skating was among the presenters at this year's Grammy Awards. She and Boyz II Men announced that James Taylor was the winner of the Grammy for best pop album for Hourglass.

Lipinski later admitted she didn't realize how unusual it was for someone who isn't in the music business to be a presenter at the Grammys.

"I haven't made a video or a record," she said. "I'm not that good of a singer."

But what she may lack in singing talent, she more than makes up for in skating ability. At age 15, Lipinski is the youngest person to win a gold medal for figure skating. She is two months younger than Norwegian Sonja Henie was when she won in 1928.

Lipinski said about winning the Olympic Gold medal that, "It was fun coming back to the States. I really felt it more when I got back here. Being with friends and family, it has sunk in. Every once in a while I can't believe this is happening. The last couple of days, I've kept it in sight."

As for thoughts about skating in the Olympics in Salt Lake City, Lipinski said "I can't think about that right now. It's so exciting, winning and skating this next year."

Bill Nye, the generally wacky "Science Guy" of children's television, toned down the "way cool" persona yesterday and spoke seriously to lawmakers in favor of modern schools, racial and sex diversity among scientists, the metric system in America — and plain English.

Appearing before the House Science Committee, a dark-suited Nye said schools will attract good teachers only when school buildings are modern and gleaming. Business people, he said, wouldn't think of working in buildings with leaky roofs and lacking power sources for computers.

"Yet we expect our teachers in this country in many cases to put up with these kinds of conditions and environments," said Nye, who grew up in Washington, D.C., but works in Seattle.

Scientists should be as racially and ethnically diverse as the population, because science "is a process created and directed by humans," he said. Also, he said, science class should be used to push the United States toward adopting the metric system.

Pioneering CBS News president dies

By David Bauder
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Fred W. Friendly, the former CBS News president and producer who teamed up with Edward R. Murrow on some of television's most groundbreaking documentaries, then became an academic guardian of journalistic standards, has died. He was 82. Friendly died Tuesday at his New York home after a series of strokes.

He was the behind-the-scenes force on such documentaries as Harvest of Shame in 1961, about migrant farm workers, and the Murrow See It Now report that hastened the downfall of Sen. Joseph McCarthy during the 1950s.

Friendly became president of CBS News in 1964. He resigned abruptly on Feb. 15, 1966, when the network broadcast an "I Love Lucy" rerun while NBC went live with a Senate hearing on Vietnam. The next day, he accepted a job with the Ford Foundation to help launch public broadcasting. He later joined Columbia University as a professor and, through the 1980s, ran a series of televised seminars on ethics and the media.

CBS News president Andrew Heyward called Friendly "a tireless crusader for the highest ideals of journalism."

"The only road he knew was the high road, and the clear view from there helped the rest of us find our way," Heyward said. Part showman, part salesman, Friendly was a major influence in the development of television documentaries. He found ways to present serious issues without putting viewers to sleep. Over the years, he won 10 Peabody Awards.

"He was both my friend and my boss — which it often difficult," said "60 Minutes" commentator Andy Rooney. "There aren't many people to whom I bow."

Friendly published numerous articles and five books, including The Good Guys, the Bad Guys and the First Amendment and Due to Circumstances Beyond Our Control, an account of his 16 years at CBS.

He was quick to speak out when anyone violated what he considered the principles of his profession.

Television news, he once said, was in danger of being "twisted into an electronic carnival, in which showbiz wizardry and values obscure the line between entertainment and news."

He was born Ferdinand Friendly Wachenheimer in New York City. A childhood fascination with history and radio led him to apply for work at a Providence, R.I., radio station, WEAN, after graduation from business college there.

During World War II, he served with the information and education section in the Army, winning the Soldier's Medal for helping rescue survivors of a dock explosion in India.

In 1948 he met Murrow and they began to collaborate, first on the best-selling I Can Hear It Now album for Columbia Records — an oral history of 1932 to 1945 — then on a CBS radio network series, "Hear It Now."

They took the format to television with "See It Now." Its initial prime-time broadcast on Nov. 18, 1951, was the first coast-to-coast TV hookup. The award-winning series, which ran seven years, included Murrow's classic examination of McCarthy's communist witch hunt.

From 1959 to 1964, Friendly was executive producer of "CBS Reports," which won more than 40 major awards for its documentaries. He was reluctant to leave the job to take over as news division president.

When Friendly quit CBS, he said it was a matter of principle. Others said he had worn out his welcome with his tough, driven style. In The Powers That Be, author David Halberstam described Friendly as "a man who always came equipped with his own precipice from which to jump."

Friendly was an instructor at Columbia from 1966 to 1990. "He was filled with vitality and driven by his vision and not a little anger about what happened at CBS," said Geraldo Rivera, one of his students. "But he wasn't one of those disgruntled people who retreated into some dark corner to lick their wounds and dream about the good ol' days."

The televised Columbia University Seminars on Media and Society brought jurists, journalists, government officials and others together to discuss everything from libel to health care, terrorism to the Constitution.

"General Hospital" tells the truth about Luke & Laura

By David Bauder
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Nearly 20 years ago, Luke and Laura of "General Hospital" became daytime television's most popular couple after what the show romanticized as Luke's "seduction" of Laura. The writers glossed over how it really happened: Luke raped Laura on the floor of a closed disco late one night.

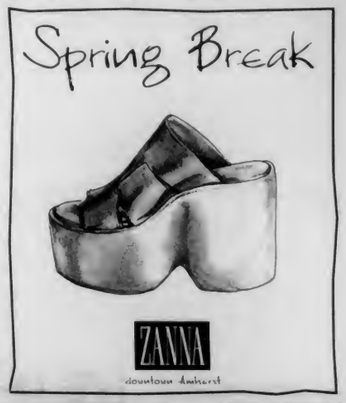
Now "General Hospital" is revising that episode from its past in part to illustrate how attitudes toward date rape have changed since 1979 and to make clear that the story wouldn't be handled the same way today.

"My first reaction was that it was a big can of worms that could eat us alive. I was terrified, basically," said Anthony Geary, the actor who plays Luke Spencer.

In the original story line, Luke was tormented by his lust for Laura. Feeling he had nothing to lose upon learning the mob had a contract out on his life, he forced himself upon her.

Much to the show's surprise, the two characters were a big hit with viewers. So the writers had them run off together, fall in love and get married. "General Hospital" subsequently referred to the disco incident as a seduction, angering many women.

Luke and Laura are still together and have a 16-year-old son, Lucky.



In tomorrow's episode, Lucky is told that his father once raped his mother.

Complicating matters even further — remember, this is a soap opera — Lucky learns about this from his arch-enemy, the illicit offspring of his mother and a man with whom she had an affair.

"For us, it was a great opportunity," said Wendy Riche, executive producer. "We didn't approach it as 'let's make amends.' We didn't feel guilty or felt like we had to."

But Riche acknowledged that the same story line — a woman falling in love with her rapist — wouldn't pass muster with viewers today.

"It would be different," she said. "The times are different. What the audience perceives and what they expect is very different from what it was 20 years ago. They are more conscious date rape is unacceptable."

coach Jerry York said.

Things started out fine for the Minutemen as BC's Andy Powers and UMass' Dean Campanale traded goals in the first period.

However, the Minutemen once again had trouble generating offense, and had only five shots through the midway point of the game. Then, whenever UMass did have an opportunity, Eagles netminder Scott Clemmensen was up to the challenge.

"I thought that he (Clemmensen) was very solid and made some big saves," York said. "He's a key part of our club."

One of the problems on the night for UMass were mental lapses. From those mistakes BC was able to capitalize turnovers into goals.

"This was more or less a very slow played game. They capitalized on a couple of opportunities, and it seemed like we didn't have any legs at all," Mallen said. "Maybe the two tough games against Boston University took a little bit more out of us than their two games against UMass–Lowell did."

The Minutemen now have their backs against the wall, and are facing a do or die situation on Saturday night against Maine if they are to qualify for the Hockey East playoffs. In order for UMass to make it, they must beat Maine and Merrimack must lose to Boston University on Saturday night.

with five goals this weekend.

"We basically decided to take it one game at a time, and hopefully win Easterns, and make the teams in the west aware that we can compete with them."

Marcie Hupp is also very valuable to the team because she is the two–meter set, that is, the position that makes the offense work.

"She is closely related to a point guard in basketball, she sets up the plays, but without her the offense doesn't click," McOsker said.

Hupp was happy with her team's performance at the Princeton tournament.

"I was impressed with the way we played together, and the tough style of defense we play worked so well," said Hupp.

McOsker is also expecting big things from his freshman who had a good showing at the tournament. Katie Mayer tallied one goal, Erin Hillier also chipped in with one. Sarah Newell came up big, banging home four goals in four games.

McOsker said leadership would be important to this UMass squad. Barbara Hickey and Lyndsay Crenshaw will take a big step up as the leaders of this relatively young team.

"These two players are going to provide the leadership this young team will need to achieve its goals," McOsker said.

■ men's basketball

without their top rebounder, outrebounded a smaller Virginia Tech squad 42– 26, and owned a 19–6 edge on the offensive glass.

The reason for the large margin is very simple: Lari Ketner played like he was the best center in college basketball. The junior gave perhaps his most complete effort of the season with a game–high 15 rebounds — 11 on the defensive end — and 21 points.

Five Minutemen also contributed at least four rebounds. Chris Kirkland finished with six, while Mike Babul added five.

The defensive intensity was just as effective as UMass held the Hokies' starting guards scoreless for nearly 39 of the game's 40 minutes.

"UMass is just too strong," said Virginia Tech coach Bobby Hussey, whose team finished the season 10–17. "They pounded us on the boards. When you're outrebounded 42– 26, it's real tough to win."

Rolan Roberts, one of six freshmen on the Hokies' squad, led Virginia Tech with 21 points, four rebounds and four blocks.

Charlton Clarke, after a solid performance at Temple last Sunday, was once again Mr. Clutch for UMass. The junior anchored a 13–2 Minuteman run to open the game with seven points on three field goals. Clarke led an offensive thrust in which all eight UMass players had at least one assist, with four three–pointers and 21 points.

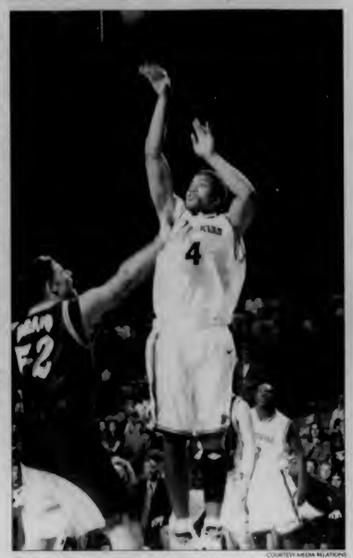
When the Hokies solved Clarke by switching to a man–to– man defense, the Minutemen pounded the ball inside to Ketner, who used his overwhelming size and quickness to his advantage. Ketner unveiled an arsenal of short–range hooks and turnaround jumpers.

"With Tyrone out, I have a bigger load to take on offense," Ketner said. "I also have to concentrate on rebounding now."

After a stretch of four bad games, in which UMass dropped three, Flint was satisfied with his team's effort Saturday.

"I thought we played hard today," he said. "We didn't always play smart, but we played hard."

For the second game in a row, Flint called upon freshman guard Rafael Cruz to perform after fellow freshman guard Jonathan DePina was ineffective.



Flint did not deny that Cruz has been earning minutes over his classmate.

"They went to a zone, and I think [Rafael] can hit some shots," Flint said. "I tell you the kid is making the best of his opportunity."

Clarke admitted the win was refreshing for UMass, which has struggled lately, but added the team has to play with the same intensity from now on.

"This is a new season. We're starting from scratch now," Clarke said. "We're 1–0, and we want to keep winning because we want to accomplish some things."

UMass is trying to do something no other conference team has down before: win the A–10 championship by virtue of four wins in four days. The Minutemen's quest continues today against the Colonials, who were embarrassed by UMass on Jan. 20 in Amherst, 79–48, in their worst loss of the season.

put the ball in the net."

The attack crew that will focus on opposing nets is young, although junior Mike McKeefrey came on strong at the end of last season. And even though the Minutemen lost five of their top six scorers — including the team's leading goal scorer for the last four years in Brendan Glass, Cannella is optimistic about what his younger players bring to the table.

The Minutemen also have a potentially lethal combination of experience and talent at the midfield position. DelPercio and classmate Chris Martens will team with junior Jay Negus to boost UMass' goal production.

McKeefrey, Negus and Janowicz showed they are capable of answering Cannella's call for increased production with their performances in the team's first game last Saturday at Holy Cross, a 18–5 Minuteman win. McKeefrey and Negus each scored a hat trick and added two assists, while Janowicz hit paydirt five times.

Providing a link between the offensive and defensive ends of the field will be UMass' defensive midfielders. Massey, one of the nation's best short stick players, Eric Sopracasa and J.T. Benazzi will share the duties at the position.

"You'll notice P.G. if you come to a game this year," Cannella told the crowd at a UMass Sports Luncheon two weeks ago.

The Minutemen have the benefit of returning not only one of the nation's top goalies, but a top defender as well. Drumm, a preseason All–America candidate, has Defensive Player of the Year potential, according to Cannella. But it is his intensity and tenacious work ethic that Cannella prefers to focus on.

"He is intimidating, but he is a role model," Cannella said. "Harold Drumm sets the standard for defenders."

Drumm will see plenty of action this season, as the Minutemen play on of their most challenging schedules. An unprecedented eight home games are on the docket now the team's home, Richard F. Garber Field, has AstroTurf.

UMass will welcome Virginia to Amherst for the first time, and host Hofstra, Army, Duke, Brown and Harvard as well. The Minutemen will also travel to face Syracuse, Notre Dame and Loyola.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20)— This is a good day to make that purchase you've been putting off for some time. It may be a case of now or never, so what's your decision?

ARIES (March 21–April 19)— You and a friend or co- worker may find yourselves at cross–purposes today, but you can work things out well if you just take it slow.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20)— Keep your eyes on someone close to you today, and you'll learn an important lesson even as you uncover something that is cause for concern.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20)— The time has come for you to break with tradition and follow your instincts where a particular issue is concerned. You can wait no longer.

CANCER (June 21–July 22)— Take care that you don't jump to conclusions today. You must be willing to wait your turn when it comes to collecting information you need.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22)— You may not understand all of the messages that come your way today, but you'll realize that almost all of them can be of special benefit.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22)— You can count on someone else to come up with a plan today that fits you like a glove and allows you the freedom you need to explore a little.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22)— Progress comes in fits and starts today, but you'll be ahead of the game by day's end if you remain patient and diligent.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21)— Take care that you're not settling for something under par today only to ease tensions between yourself and a friend. Get what you want!

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21)— You may have to get involved in something that doesn't particularly suit you today, only to uncover one or two very important answers.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19)— Speak softly today, and listen carefully to what others have to say. You can get better results by being less aggressive and more receptive.

AQUARIUS (Jan 20.–Feb. 18)— Anything you try to do under the table today is likely to backfire on you, so you're going to want to keep everything above board.

Men's basketball downs VT, will face old foe

League honorees lead as Minutemen tackle Tech

By Luke Meredith
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA — If you listen to the No. 23 Massachusetts men's basketball team, the late season slide that saw the Minutemen drop from the Atlantic 10's No. 1 East seed to the No. 3 isn't anything to be concerned with now.

In their eyes, a new season started yesterday, and the Minutemen celebrated their post–season opener with a 64–58 win over Virginia Tech yesterday at the CoreStates Spectrum in Philadelphia in the first round of the A–10 tournament.

Massachusetts	64
Virginia Tech	58

UMass (22–9) will play George Washington in the quarterfinals today at 2:30 p.m. (A–10 Network, WHMP–FM, WMUA–FM).

"It's a new season," junior Charlton Clarke said. "We had a great regular season, but we have to start over. We're 1–0 and we're just trying to go as far as we can."

The final score didn't indicate how lopsided the game actually was — UMass led 61–43 with under three minutes to go — but the Minutemen slipped late, much like they did in the teams' first meeting, according to UMass coach Bruiser Flint.

Nonetheless, Massachusetts coasted to the win without the services of Tyrone Weeks, who is still day–to–day with a sprained ankle. In his absence, junior center Lari Ketner filled the void with a monster game, scoring 21 points and adding 15 rebounds.

Clarke added 21 points of his own as he and Ketner — the two UMass players named All–Conference — combined for 42 of UMass' 64 points.

Massachusetts put the game out of reach with a 19–6 run to open the game, 10 of which came from Clarke. Clarke buried a three–pointer to open the game, and with the Hokies shooting cold, he and Ketner outscored 17–6 in the game's opening 10 minutes.

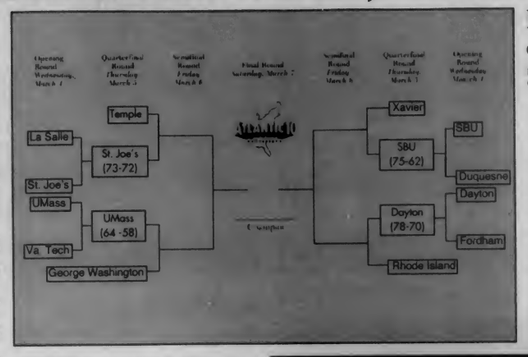
Tech cut the lead to seven, 29–22, on a Myron Guillory three–pointer with 2:29 remaining in the first half, and UMass led 31–22 at the intermission. The Minutemen then pushed the lead back to 15, 40–25, early in the second half.

Clarke went 4–of–7 from three–point range, and his 21 points were only three off his career–high (set Feb. 18 in the double overtime loss to Rhode Island at the William D. Mullins Center).

"I thought we played hard," Flint said. "Not always smart, but hard. I thought Charlton Clarke helped get us going early."

Virginia Tech closed out the game with a 15–3 run, and the final was the closest the Hokies got in the second half. Rolan Roberts led the Tech with 21 points, and Russ Wheeler added 10 points. The Hokies finished their rebuilding season at 10–17, 5–12 in the conference.

Next up for UMass is GW, a team the Minutemen destroyed 79–48 at the Mullins Center in their only meeting this season. George Washington is (22–7, 11–5 A–10) earned a first–round bye because of their second–place finish in the Atlantic 10 West.



One of the bright spots for the Minutemen was the play of Rafael Cruz, who impressed for the second straight game, after scoring eight points in his first real action of the season against Temple on Sunday. Cruz scored three points in six minutes.

Flint put him in because, "he can hit some shots" and is useful to break down zone defenses, which Virginia Tech employed against the Minutemen. Flint acknowledged that Cruz is now in the rotation.

In the noon game, St. Joseph's advanced to the quarterfinals with a 73–72 win over La Salle. St. Joe's will play Temple tonight, with the winner facing the UMass–GW winner in the semifinals tomorrow.

In last night's other first round games, West No. 3 seed Dayton escaped Fordham, 78–70. The Flyers will now face Rhode Island, which earned the East's second seed.

East No. 4 St. Bonaventure got 27 points from Rashaan Palmer to beat Duquesne, 75–62. The Bonnies will face West No. 1 Xavier today.

Ketner–Clarke combo, defense give UM win

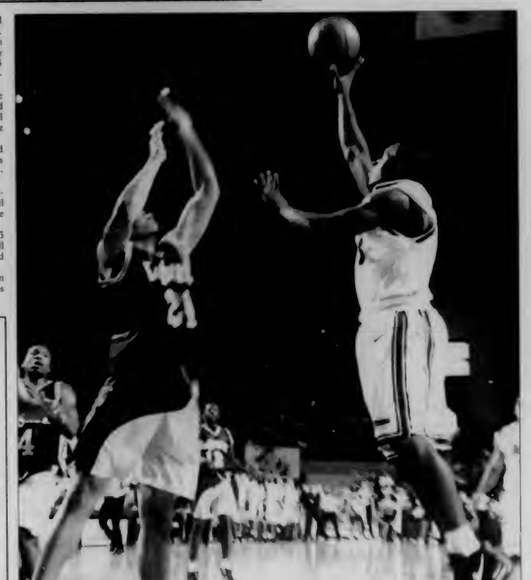
PHILADELPHIA — Has the Massachusetts men's basketball team finally returned to midseason form?

That was one of the questions swirling around the CoreStates Spectrum following the Minutemen's decisive 64–58 victory over the West No. 6 seed Virginia Tech Hokies yesterday afternoon in day one of the Atlantic 10 tournament.



Many are also wondering about the status of senior Tyrone Weeks looking ahead to today's quarterfinal matchup with West No. 2 seed George Washington (22–7) at 2:30 p.m. (A–10 Network, WHMP–FM, WMUA–FM). The senior forward, a native of Philadelphia, was inactive Wednesday after suffering a sprained ankle in practice earlier this week.

Massachusetts (22–9) coach Bruiser Flint was unsure if his forward would be able to play tomorrow.

"It's still up in the air," Flint said. "We'll see tomorrow."

From the way his team played, however, Flint may hold off on his big man with the NCAA tournament looming in the background. The Minutemen, playing

Minutemen fall to Eagles, 6–1

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

The scenario was one that the Massachusetts hockey team has become accustomed to: trailing in a close game heading into the final period.

Massachusetts	1
Boston College	6

The Minutemen were able to come back against New Hampshire, but have now dropped three in a row after falling to No. 5 Boston College 6–1 last night at the William D. Mullins Center.

UMass (6–24–1, 3–19–1 in Hockey East) fell behind 3–1 in the second period on goals by BC's Bobby Allen and Brian Gionta, and still were in the hunt heading into the final 20 minutes of play.

However, the Minutemen self–destructed within a span of the opening 7 minutes, 17 seconds of the third period, allowing three goals, and will now have to beat Maine on Saturday night at the Mullins Center if they want to reach the Hockey East playoffs.

"We just couldn't do anything right. Our passing was way off. This is the time of year where you have to have it," Massachusetts coach Joe Mallen said. "I just don't think that we had any jump, but usually during a 35–game season you have a couple of nights like that."

With the game 3–1 early in the third, UMass defenseman Mike Gaffney took a holding penalty, and the Eagles capitalized when Gionta put home the rebound of a Blake Bellefuille shot to put BC up 4–1.

Bellefuille then tacked on another goal 48 seconds later as he gathered a puck in the neutral zone, walked in uncontested on goalie Brian Regan, and slid one under the UMass netminder to increase the lead to 5–1.

Marty Reasoner would then round out the scoring at the 7:17 mark when he slipped one through the five–hole of Markus Helanen to make the final 6–1.

"In the third period, they certainly wound up picking it up a notch, and Reasoner and Gionta played real well," Mallen said. "It was kind of a slow and boring game for a Hockey East game, and it was more than a chess match then anything else."

"I thought that we played real well through the first 40 minutes, but the game was still in question heading into the third. Then we kind of took it to another level," BC

Consistency will be the key for men's lax this year

Senior captain Mike DelPercio will lead a young corps of offensive players for the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team.

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

There is only one buzzword for Massachusetts men's lacrosse coach Greg Cannella this season: consistency.

The No. 11 Minutemen have a number of returning players, a fresh crop of underclassmen and serious expectations for their first season on a new field surface, all of which Cannella hopes to blend into a winning combination.

"I want to see consistency," he said. "I want to get back to the [NCAA] quarterfinals. We have to have people consider us a tournament team year in and year out."

In order to achieve that tried and true formula, UMass will have to rely on its senior class to provide the necessary leadership. That should not be a problem for Cannella's four captains: P.G. Massey, John Kasselakis, Harold Drumm and Mike DelPercio.

Kasselakis will stand where he has for the past three seasons, as the final line of defense in front of the net. The goaltender, who statistically ranked third in the nation last season, was listed as the nation's second best returning goalie behind Hofstra netminder Mark Spruyt.

"It means a lot to have a goalie who can keep you in a tight game," Cannella said. "It's comforting to have him there, and it can be a great advantage, but we can't put all the onus on John. He is going to make his saves, and the offense needs to

Women's water polo wins four to kick off campaign

By Paul Teves
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's water polo team took a step in the right direction this weekend at the Princeton Tournament, where it went 4–0 to start the season.

The Minutewomen's wins included a victory over Slippery Rock, 13–5, and over Maryland, the defending Eastern champs, by a score of 14–3.

"We worked on what we wanted to accomplish," Dan McOsker said. "We had our defense working. The other teams could barely get the ball past midpool."

With the effort that was put forth by the team this weekend, the goal of winning Easterns is not at all a long shot.

"Our season goal is to win the Eastern championships, and put a fear in teams that play us. Make them say [they] really don't want to play UM at nationals.

"We played a superb defensive game, but we need to work on our offensive, but the team really came together," McOsker said.

McOsker, who is in his first year at the Minutewoman helm, said that he is very excited about the season and that he looks forward to working with this exciting up and coming team.

Katie Grogan, a sophomore, is expected to be a big part of the team. She is a returning All–American, and proved it this weekend by netting 18 goals in four games.

The other returning All–American is junior Andrea Vazquez. She to was a big part of this weekends offense, as she scored 12 goals of her own. Vazquez is also one of the tri–captains.

Another captain is Peggy Nieves, the goalie who only had to make 23 saves in four games due to the team's intense defense.

Sophomore Claudia Clement is also a captain on the team. This young captain also contributed

Thirty dead after bus bombs explode

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka (AP) — A bus packed with at least two shrapnel–laden bombs exploded yesterday outside a crowded train station in the Sri Lankan capital, killing at least 32 people and injuring more than 300.

The defense ministry said senior government officials were the target, but the bombs went off prematurely. The government blamed rebels seeking an independent homeland for Sri Lanka's Tamil minority.

The bus blew apart at one of the city's busiest intersections, shredding vehicles and ripping facades from buildings. The dead included at least three children from schools in the area and two police officers.

School books, a plastic lunch box and children's shoes were scattered around the site, littered among the twisted hulks of cars and trucks. The bus driver — believed to be a suicide bomber — was among the dead.

"This was not a conventional bomb," Defense Ministry spokesman Sarath Munasinghe said, saying the bombs had been carefully positioned on both sides of the bus "so that when they explode, it would kill people around."

If the bus had gone much farther, it would have reached the route normally taken by government ministers to attend Parliament, Munasinghe said.

Lawsuit to block bio–prospecting

WASHINGTON (AP) — The National Park Service was accused in a lawsuit yesterday of illegally selling off federal resources in secret contracts with biotech researchers who want to patent microbes from Yellowstone's hot springs.

"The Park Service cut a backroom deal and bent laws to allow the commercial exploitation of Yellowstone," said Joseph Mendelson, a lawyer for one of the plaintiffs who argue U.S. law prohibits any natural resources — from minerals to pine cones — from being removed from national parks.

"The precedent set by this agreement threatens not only Yellowstone, but all of our parks," Mendelson said of the International Center for Technology Assessment, a public interest group based here.

The Alliance for the Wild Rockies of Missoula, Mont., and the Edmonds Institute of Edmonds, Wash., joined in the lawsuit filed in U.S. District Court here yesterday seeking to block pending contracts with Diversa Inc. of San Diego.

The deal could be worth millions of dollars to Diversa, but to date the Park Service has refused to disclose what kind of royalties the federal government would receive as a result of the so–called bio–prospecting for patents on the tiny organisms in the rare thermal pools.

RSOs discuss UC 2000, shared concerns revealed

Judy Steinkamp from the Office of Campus Planning and Space Management takes questions concerning the Student Union.

Collegian Staff

Students dissatisfied with the University Center 2000 (UC 2000) plan for renovating the Campus Center and Student Union presented their plan to Registered Student Organization's (RSO) in a meeting yesterday that also included a UC 2000 presentation.

The Campus Community Center Coalition (CCCC) is a newly formed group that designed and presented an alternative plan to the administration's UC 2000 plan to renovate the Campus Center and Student Union.

In a presentation following the UC 2000 presentation, chairman of CCCC Keith McCormic said their plan would be chosen if students show support for it.

"For our plan to be approved we need student backing loud enough for the chancellor to hear it," McCormic said.

The CCCC plan includes a sports bar and a night club on the third floor of the Campus Center.

Also RSOs will design their own space to specific needs.

"We say here's some space. The architect will help you build it to your state," McCormic said.

However, the majority of the meeting was spent getting RSO feedback on the UC 2000 plan through an open forum and breaking into groups to list problems with the plan.

After hearing the plan for a foodcourt some members of Earthfoods had concerns about location and customers needs.

"It's kind of like a mall foodcourt? Would there be a

UMass professor retires with high honors

By Eric Petersen
Collegian Staff

Most people get a gold watch when they retire.

University of Massachusetts Amherst Chemical Engineering Professor Vladimir Haensel is closing out his career receiving a gold medal, a citation and $450,000.

On Feb. 24, Haensel was awarded the prestigious Charles Stark Draper Prize, engineering's highest honor, in Washington D.C. The Draper Prize is a biennial award presented by the National Academy of Engineering that recognizes achievements in the field of engineering that have contributed to the well–being of humanity world–wide.

In addition to the medal, the money and the honor of receiving such an award, however, Haensel believes he has something even better to show for his 60 years of hard work.

"I never had a day when I said, 'Thank God it's Friday,'" he said.

Haensel was chosen for the Draper Prize for his 1947 invention of "Platforming," a process of oil refinement that produces cleaner fuel much more efficiently than earlier methods. Platforming, short for platinum transforming, uses pellets of platinum to speed certain chemical reactions during oil refinement. This results in higher octanes, more fuel from the same amount of crude oil, and fuel that burns cleaner, eliminating the need to add lead.

Many consider this invention to be one of the most significant in chemical engineering in the last 50 years.

"Haensel has created what can only be called a revolution in mobility," said Paul Jennings, a professor of civil engineering at the California Institute of Technology in Pasadena and chairman of the Draper Prize committee.

Platforming also produces, as a by–product, the aromatic hydrocarbons necessary for the production of many modern plastics. These plastics are used to manufacture medical devices, automobiles, synthetics for clothing and tapes for audio and visual recording.

"We are all delighted at the recognition of Val's spectacular professional accomplishments with this most prestigious award," Michael F. Malone, head of the Chemical Engineering department, said last October when Haensel was chosen to receive the prize.

"If Val's idea worked, it has as much to do with his making it work as the technology behind it."

The Charles Stark Draper Prize, named for "Doc" Draper, is an endowment from the Charles Stark Draper Laboratories, Inc. in Cambridge. Draper is best known as the father of the modern guidance systems used today in aircraft, space vehicles, missiles and submarines. This year's honorarium of $450,000 is the world's largest of its kind.

"This [the Draper Prize] is really the Nobel Prize of Engineering," said Robert McIntosh, an electrical engineering professor.

"In the world, there is no higher award in the field of engineering. Some of the past recipients include the inventors of the integrated circuit, which made computers possible, space communications, and FOR–

BMCP aims to introduce UMass students to the music industry

By Gregory Casimir
Collegian Staff

Registration begins today for the annual University of Massachusetts Black Mass Communication Project (BMCP) Conference. The purpose of this two–day event is to provide those with an interest in pursuing careers in the music industry with an opportunity to network, and to broaden an awareness of the music industry to the general UMass and New England communities.

The coordinators of this year's conference are Anthony Graham, Cisco Kelly, Navjit Saini, James Lewis and other members of the BMCP board.

Registration will begin at 5 p.m. on the Campus Center Concourse. Admission will be $7 for UMass students, and $30 for the general public.

Tonight's events will include a welcoming address, live poetry and an after party at the Malcolm X Cultural Center.

The conference provides students with an opportunity to network with some of New England's premier disc jockeys and retailers, as well as national artists and industry executives. BMCP's conference also provides students the chance to acquire internships and other hands–on experience in the music industry.

The conference features many informational workshops geared towards educating people about all aspects of the music industry: the origins, politics and business. These workshops will begin tomorrow at 10 a.m. in the Campus Center.

Some of the panels include: "Sistas' in the industry," "Beatmakers and Producers," and "The State of College and Commercial Radio."

The keynote speakers will be Daddy–O, producer and former executive of MCA Records, and UMass alumnus Kevin Mitchell, of Codeine records.

Following the keynote address, the conference will close with a fashion expo and artist showcase, featuring artists Peter Gunz and Lord Tariq, that will take place in the Student Union Ballroom.

Shannan Magee, a BMCP member, encourages students to register for BMCP's weekend seminar on the music industry.

"This weekend will allow students to learn valuable material not taught in any classroom," she said.

UVC opens its doors to candidates, public for final SGA debate

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Candidates for Student Government Association (SGA) President and Trustee will get a last chance after a week of debates to make their opinions known to the students in two final debates Sunday before the elections.

There will be a debate from 7–9 p.m. televised by UVC–TV19.

Questions will be asked by a representative from UVC–TV19, WMUA and the Massachusetts Daily Collegian.

In addition to being televised, the public is welcome to come to the UVC–TV19 studio to see the debate.

Chancellor of Elections Carlos Alvarez said as many people that can fit in the studio are welcome.

"They can come until the studio is full," Alvarez said.

Alvarez also said members of the audience are welcome to ask the candidates questions after the debate citing last year as an example.

"A lot of people may want to ask questions after the debate. After the cameras go off I think it would be good for people from the audience to ask questions. Last year they kept right on going even after the time allotted," Alvarez said.

There will also be a debate earlier on Sunday in the Latin American Cultural Center from 3–6 p.m.

This will be an open debate. Audience members will be able to ask the candidates questions during the debate.

The candidates for President are Phillip Blue, Jesse Burchfield, Jennifer Casasanto, Daniel Parker, Amy Pelligrino and Salwa Shamapande.

The candidates for Student Trustee are Eleanor Court, Brenda Fitzpartick, Erik Hansen, Jeffrey Howe, Eric Magazu, Evan Rozantes and Brian Tirrell.

Although candidates can't run officially as pairs several of the candidates have teamed up to share resources as well as campaign issues.

Salwa Shamapande and Eleanor Court are teaming up as are Amy Pelligrino and Jeffrey Howe and Daniel Parker and Erik Hansen. Also working in tandem are Jesse Burchfield and Brenda Fitzpatrick as well as Phillip Blue and Eric Magazu.

Three students are running for offices as individuals. They are Jennifer Casasanto, Evan Rozantes and Brian Tirrell.

The elections are on Monday, March 9 and Tuesday, March 10. Polling places will be open Monday and Tuesday from 11 a.m.–2 p.m. and again 4–7 p.m.

Students will be able to vote in polling places at any dining commons. Commuter area students will be able to vote on the Campus Center Concourse and at the Newman Center.

Charitable programs lack male volunteers

By Jason Eiseman
Collegian Staff

To many people, donating their time to volunteer organizations is part of their social responsibility. They find their greatest joy by helping those who need it, and asking for nothing in return.

So why are there so few men enjoying an enriching pastime?

University of Massachusetts Chaplain for the United Christian Foundation for the campus Protestant ministry, Kent Higgins is organizing a volunteer trip to Birmingham, Ala. to help rebuild an African–American church. Higgins said the trip has attracted about 90 percent women.

"What is going on with the guys?" Higgins asked. According to Higgins, UMass is not alone with this problem, in fact, it seems to be a national trend.

Higgins said the problem may have to do with the way people are raised, or socialized, but he said it is not new.

"It's not something that's just cropped up this year," he said.

He said it is not a bad thing, but he wants men to know this opportunity is out there for them, because men are not taking advantage of it. However, not everyone sees it as a problem.

Anthropology professor Art Keene said he is planning a similar service learning trip to Appalachia.

"I'm not sure it's a problem," Keene said. Currently he has 11 women and six men who've volunteered for the trip. "It's not like there isn't interest on the part of guys."

Keene agrees there seems to be a trend which shows more women are gravitating towards community service more than men do but said it's not problematic.

"I'm not that worried," Keene said. "I don't know that it's an issue right now."

Larry Redmond, the director of volunteer recruitment, and case coordinator for the Big Brothers and Big Sisters, said he is concerned about the lack of big brothers he has volunteering for the program.

He held an information session in John Adams Residence Hall, he said about 30 women attended compared to four men.

"We have many big sisters, there's a lack of big brothers," Redmond said. He said because there are so few men volunteers, there is a waiting list for little brothers looking for big brothers.

Website offers dry alternative

By Lorraine Kennedy
Collegian Staff

"Hot without the sauce" is the slogan describing the activities on the new Chilipeppers website, a listing of fun, alcohol-free events for Five College students.

Sponsored by the Five College Alcohol and Other Drug Committee, the website is a collaboration of the Five College health educators, who sought to develop an accessible listing of alcohol-free alternatives for area students.

"It's an easy way for people to click on and see what's going on at the other campuses," said Sally Damon, health educator at University Health Services at the University of Massachusetts.

On a weekly basis, members from all Five College campuses, except Hampshire College, which is currently without a contact person, can send a webmaster information about area events. The website, http://www.smith.edu/chilipeppers, is updated every Thursday night, lists 10 categories of activities: road-trips, parties, dances, performances, music, cultural events, movies, outdoor fun, stress busters and miscellaneous.

According to Smith College student and webmaster Haley Miller, the site includes events that are "specifically designed for students in this area... who are not in the mood for [alcoholic] drinks."

Miller said there has been no shortage of activities to include on the website.

"There's so much out there," Miller said. "We've gathered about 100 events."

Rob MacDonald, the contact person from UMass, said he compiles events from a variety of sources, including posted fliers and the Campus Activities Office website. He welcomes suggestions and can be reached by e-mail at, no_sauce@hotmail.com.

Miller emphasized that they are trying to be selective about the events they choose. Ideally, they seek to compile a "pared-down list" of events which appeals to "as wide a group as possible."

"We're trying to list very positive, fun things, not academic lectures," Miller said.

She insisted that the events are not "in-your-face anti-alcohol," but rather more about "having fun."

"If [the events] happen to be alcohol-free, then great," Miller said.

Connie Peterson, Smith College Health Education coordinator, stressed she and the other organizers are not prohibitionists.

"We just want to show that you can have fun without alcohol or any other drug," Peterson said.

Professors, Hillel host holiday food debate

By Meher Singh
Collegian Staff

In celebration of the Jewish holiday, Purim, the Hillel Foundation and the University of Massachusetts Jewish Faculty Group are sponsoring the Latke vs. Hamantash Debate. The event takes place Sunday at 12:30 p.m. in the Hillel House.

Purim originates from a story about Jewish freedom from oppression involving an anti-Semite, Haman, who was intent on destroying the Jewish people in his country. His plans were foiled, however, as the King at the time destroyed Haman's wicked plans. It is from that day that the Jewish people decided to celebrate this holiday, on the 11th evening of March each year.

The message behind Purim is that everyone should be able to laugh at those who try to oppress, as that is the first step in becoming truly free. Purim is therefore a fun holiday with a long tradition of celebration with plays and musicals. Purim was first officially celebrated at UMass in 1979.

The debate this Sunday will be between four University professors who will praise two traditional Jewish foods, latke (a potato pancake eaten during Chanukah) and hamantash (a fruit-filled pastry eaten during Purim). The professors will argue for these foods with respect to their fields of interest.

Professor Gerald Freedman of the economics department will debate for latke, and his topic is "Potatoes Rule." Professor Ruth Abrams of the Judaic studies department will also debate for latke, and her topic is "A Jewish Feminist Historical Analysis of the Latke."

The remaining two professors, Israel Koren of the electrical and computer engineering department, and professor Jeffrey Haus of the Judaic studies department, will be arguing for hamantash. Koren's topic is "Hamantash: The Next Breakthrough in Computer Technology," and Haus' topic is "Hamantashen and the Jewish Question."

Everyone is welcome to this debate. A brunch will be served at 11:30 a.m. for the cost of $8.90 — for students on any UMass meal plan, the cost is $2.50; free if on the Kosher meal plan. The brunch is optional; however, it is recommended but not necessary for students and faculty to call the Hillel House beforehand to reserve a seat.

There will also be a Purim-day celebration at the Hillel House on March 11, at 7 p.m. Students are encouraged to come in costume and bring noisemakers as there will be a contest.

"Guys who are in the program find it to be one of the best things they've ever done in their life," Redmond said.

Redmond believes that men underrate themselves, and often don't think they are worthy enough to be role models.

"A guy may put his expectations too high, think he has to be this incredible person," Redmond said. "It's about being a friend, it doesn't have to be a heavy, heavy relationship."

Redmond said students do not have to be role models, they just need to be friends to little brothers who usually come from low-income families. He said they just have to be a good person with their heart in the right place. Redmond said when he does get men to come through the door and learn about the program, he usually has a high success rate with getting them to join the program.

Higgins thinks there may be a larger sociological difference with how men and women are culturalized.

"Maybe there's just more altruism in women," Higgins said. "Why can't men be tuned into that? In what sense are men tuned into that?"

Higgins said the exceptions are the fraternities, with their various charitable works.

TRAN, which was the first computer programming language. That should give you an idea of the scope of an achievement that receives this award," McIntosh said.

"It's a tribute both to Val and to the previous winners to add his name to the list of awardees," said Malone.

The Draper Prize is not the only recognition Haensel has received in his long career. Among his other awards are the Professional Progress Award of the American Institute of Engineers, the Perkins Medal in 1967, and the National Medal of Science in 1973. He is one of very few individuals to be a member of both the National Academies of Sciences and of Engineering, and he was the first recipient of the National Sciences Award for Chemistry in Service to Society.

Over the years, he has been granted more than 150 U.S. patents and 450 foreign patents.

Haensel, born in Germany and raised in Moscow, Russia, emigrated to the United States at the age of 16 unable to speak a word of English. He went on to receive his bachelor's degree from Northwestern University and his post-graduate degree from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

He began his teaching career at UMass in 1980 after 42 years as a researcher, and later vice president, for Universal Oil Products, because, as he said, "they [the University] offered me a job."

Haensel looks upon the Draper Prize and the money it brings with the same straight-forward attitude. When asked what he intended to do with $450,000, all he said was, "First of all, pay some taxes."

Discussing race relations

I can't stop thinking about a class I had Tuesday morning. Our discussion encompassed a controversial, sensitive issue: race relations. I think this particular meeting spoke to every person who resided in the room, in several different ways. The discussion was so disturbing to me that I have been virtually unproductive in my other academic work from dwelling on the issue.

All week I have mulled over the content of our debate. The head that rests upon my shoulders is weary from the toil of constantly rehashing the class dialogue. At several points throughout the day, I almost wished I hadn't said a word in class. But now, as I reflect upon my words, I am glad that I spoke up. I believe in what I had to say. In summary, I present to you my ideas:

We, as citizens of the United States, consider ourselves to practice democracy. For years we have claimed to be this "melting pot" of peoples, traditions and cultures. Citizens concerned with race relations are trying to move towards the future, a future void of prejudices and stereotypes. Our goal is to become a society in which people are not judged by the color of their skin, but by the character an individual holds. We have taken upon ourselves the struggle to see all people just as that — people. Humans. As a whole, people need to see the humanity harbored in each individual.

Yet, with all of these ideas considered, I believe that we are doing just the opposite through our separation into various groups and organizations. I support the fact that it is important to be an individual, and to be proud of one's individuality. It is important to be aware of one's roots, culture and history, and to articulate that awareness. At the same time, though, the more we articulate our differences, the more we set ourselves apart from one another. The more subdivisions we create — i.e. I am French, you are Hispanic, she is Jewish, he is Cuban — the more we make ourselves into representations of labels instead of humans. I am not promoting conformity by any means, but a wholeness and togetherness as humanity.

If it is possible to imagine about one hundred hands shooting up in the air, you do a good job of picturing the exaggeration I felt in class. It seemed as though everyone had something to say regarding my statement. I held my breath waiting for responses I had anticipated since the first word of my speech passed my lips. Though everyone was respectful of what I had to say, the majority of the class didn't seem very receptive to my point. In short I now present some reactions my ideas provoked:

"It was made clear that being 'one big, happy family of humanity' was idealistic, somewhat romanticized and unrealistic."

Nicole Lavin

It seemed as though most people disagreed with the idea that organizations, such as houses or dormitory floors designated for different ethnic groups and/or races was a form, on the smallest level, of segregation. Also, it was made clear that being "one big happy family of humanity" was idealistic, somewhat romanticized and unrealistic. The point was made that it would not be an easy process, getting everyone to unite, and that it would most likely not happen in this lifetime. The point was also made that it is a truth and a reality that a person's physicality is the first trait seen and noted. It is unfortunate, but unavoidable, that when we describe a person, we start with their color, such as "He was black, with a shaved head. He had on a blue shirt..."

As people were responding to what I had said, I sat in my chair trying to muster up every ounce of strength I had. It took the energy from every inch of my body, from the tips of my toes to every hair follicle on my head, to choke back the tears that were welling in my eyes. I suddenly became so emotional, I hadn't any idea what to do with myself. As I struggled to shake the tearing sensation out of my eyes, I managed to gain some form of composure and proceed with my final response. Here it is:

Yes, I do feel that separate houses, floors and organizations are a form of segregation, or at least separation. A house designated for a baseball team is a form of separation also.

Maybe it is somewhat naive to think that it is possible for people to come together, but I think we can improve on our situation. Maybe "togetherness" won't happen in this lifetime, but throwing in the towel because of what we consider to be unrealistic goals and watching problems occur to ourselves and those around us is much worse a crime than being hopeful and unsuccessfully attempting to better our world. It won't be an easy process, trying to get rid of stereotypes and prejudices, and people will get hurt, offended and angry. But unless we address the issue of race, it will worsen without fail.

Ignorance can be bliss, but where race is concerned it is a disease. Race is the one issue that everyone is a part of, but no one wants to deal with. Good idea. If we ignore the fact that we have our own little civil wars going on, then we can pretend that they don't exist at all. As for a better situation, all we can do is try.

Nicole Lavin is a UMass student.

Remember your manners

Has the entire world gone crazy or is it just me?

I mean there are a lot of jerks out there in the world, and many of them seem to flock to this campus. To me, it's the little things that count in life. It does not take a lot to make life just a little more pleasant for each other, but very few people seem to want to make the effort.

Now, of course you have to look out for yourself, but that does not mean that you should go around being miserable and making other people's lives miserable as well.

Jason Eiseman

Everyone is allowed to have bad days, and get into a sour mood. That is when you have to try your best to smile a little bit, and do your best to not put other people into a bad mood. Sometimes this is impossible to do, but you still have to try.

Let's start with needless complaining. Sometimes it is necessary to complain so people know that something is wrong, but most complaining is just worthless.

The other day I was in the Hatch getting soup. They had been so busy that many of the soups were not ready because they were too cold. While I was a little inconvenienced because I would not have time for the cream of broccoli to warm up, I did not let it bother me. The guy behind me though, had some major issues. As if not having the Hungarian mushroom was going to make or break his day, he spent the next five minutes complaining to the guy behind the counter. I don't know whether or not he realized that badgering the poor guy serving the soup wasn't going to make the soup any warmer.

It was just needless complaining. Remember, especially on campus, but also in other towns in the area, that many of the workers are students. Their lives are difficult enough without another student humiliating them over a bowl of soup.

Everyone makes mistakes, and we have to be way more understanding, and allow people to make mistakes and learn from them. Sometimes a waiter is going to mix up an order. Sometimes your food is going to come out late. Sometimes the bartender isn't going to notice you immediately. These are just a handful of the millions of mistakes which are made every day, and, yes, they do cause an inconvenience, but there is no need to make the situation more difficult by complaining. Just live with it, accept it, reassure the person who made the mistake that it's okay.

My biggest pet peeve is people who don't hold doors. That is probably the most common, yet most overlooked, form of courtesy in the world. Once I was walking into the Campus Center behind some girl. I tried to quickly get behind her so that when she held the door, I would be ready to get through. When she didn't hold the door, it took me completely by surprise, cracking my nose. I yelled in pain, but she didn't seem to care, she just kept strolling along the concourse, not caring that she had just mauled somebody. How much of an inconvenience is it for somebody to just wait a few more seconds to hold the door for someone behind them.

It's just about being nice. This is a free country, people are entitled to be jerks. It is everybody's right to act like a jerk. But why would you want to do that? We all have to share this miserable mudball called Earth. As students we have to share this campus. We're all in the same boat. Every day we should do whatever we can to make life on this campus just a little nicer, just a little better. There are already too many jerks out there; be unique, be nice.

I'm not saying people should be happy all the time. How would we know what happiness was if we weren't sad occasionally. I'm saying try not to bring others down with you.

I think it all comes down to respect, and there is a big misconception about respect. I've heard people say that you have to earn respect. That is wrong. You have to earn trust. Everyone deserves respect. Everyone deserves to be treated with a certain amount of dignity. If you want people to respect you, you have to show them the same respect.

I just want to see things turned around. I haven't even mentioned the meatheads that get into fights every weekend, and I would rather not say anymore about them.

I think if people were just a little more courteous and polite, this campus would be a much better place. There would be no whining and complaining for no reason there would be no door-holding selfishness. So please, please just be nice.

Save Spring Concert by supporting UPC

To the editor:

After reading the March 4 article about the state of UPC's ability to produce quality shows, I have a few thoughts I'd like to share. What is the one thing that students at UMass enjoy doing together — I mean other than watching basketball games? That's right — Spring Concert. And how can we as students work together to produce such an event? Yes, by helping UPC.

I'll admit that I haven't rolled up my sleeves to help UPC, but what they can offer this community is something everyone should fight for. In recent years, UPC has brought to campus such acts as Maceo Parker, Blues Traveler, KRS One and Taj Mahal, not to mention scores of other groups that I can't remember right now.

UPC even promotes local acts — which many UMass students are involved with. As far as UPC's RSO status is concerned, let the SGA know that this is a student group that we all benefit from. UPC's funding can be increased — but only if we convince the SGA to do it.

Students deserve Spring Concert

To the editor:

According to Wednesday's article in the Daily Collegian (March 4), University Productions and Concerts (UPC) claimed that they do not have the necessary funds to produce a Spring Concert this year at UMass. An outside vendor, MassConcerts, offered to organize a concert at no extra charge to the students. Responding to this, Judy Gagnon, Assistant Director of Campus Activities Advising Center, stated that it would be a mistake to work with an outside promoter who wants to make a profit. Gagnon then continues, "Besides, UPC has the ability to book these shows themselves."

Obviously, UPC doesn't. Gagnon's quote clearly contradicts itself. If UPC had the ability to book a spring concert, then a spring concert would be in the making and we would not be writing this. Being members of this large student body, it is seldom that we have large events to look forward to. The Spring Concert is a great production that should be looked forward to every year by students on this campus. Last year's spring concert may have been a bit short of expectations in terms of attendance, but most of those who attended enjoyed it, including myself.

It is pretty clear that UPC is being ridiculously stubborn in not allowing MassConcerts to produce and fund this year's spring concert. According to the article, there is nothing in SGA by-laws that prohibits outside vendors from co-sponsoring an event such as the spring concert. It is foolish to turn down MassConcerts' offer which would not cost students any additional charge. It is frustrating that UPC won't give MassConcerts a chance if they can't put on a show themselves.

We don't believe that UPC has the right to deny the student body a thing that is as eagerly anticipated as the spring concert. There is a student activity fee on our tuition bill which we have all paid, so money should not be an excuse. Other than laziness or selfishness, there is no excuse for the cancellation of the spring concert.

To the editor:

This letter is to the UPC in response to the article in the Wed. March 4 paper about the Spring Concert. I am absolutely outraged that the UPC has the audacity to reject the more than generous offer from John Peters and MassConcerts. The fact that he is more than willing to supply funding and his own time to assist the UMass campus in holding a Spring Concert is more than generous. This tradition of having a spring concert can't and shouldn't be stopped because UPC doesn't have the funding or the staff.

John Peters offers not only a spring concert but a spring concert that will be free to UMass students. A concert that has been something that the whole school can partake in and has been free to the students for many years before this (except last years). I don't know whose decision it was to reject this offer but I would appreciate it if the whole SGA was able to vote on it, or maybe even the whole school to vote.

I am a graduating senior and would appreciate a concert that I have paid for in my tuition for the last four years. The amount of money that I have paid this University alone should at least allow us the luxury of a spring concert. To all those students out there who share my view, take a few minutes to write your own letter of support of the spring concert and maybe they will pay attention to what the real student body wants. Thanks again for your offer John Peters.

No more Titanic bashing

To the editor:

This is ridiculous how you continue to publish these anti-Titanic columns. The one in the Arts section about two weeks ago was bad enough, but today's (March 4) column has put the final nail in the coffin. It is time for you guys to admit it, Titanic is a fabulous movie. What other movie has ever continued to sell out every show, seven weeks after opening.

The only reason these writers are going against this movie is because everyone else in America is in love with this film. I don't know why some people always have to go against the grain. I bet you anything that if Titanic had bombed, then these writers would be going on about how great a movie it is.

Yes, I am one of those people who is obsessed with the movie. Yes, I have seen this movie four times. But, it is not because of this dire need to see Leonard DiCaprio without a shirt on. It is because Titanic is a fabulous movie. The acting, the romance and the special effects. What more could a movie lover ask for. Maybe, if your columnists sat down for a moment and thought about that, and forgot about just bashing something just because everyone else was going crazy over it, then maybe their columns would have a little more substance.

Response to the campaign paper storm

To the editor:

Lately, the entire campus is plastered with obnoxious yellow signs with the words "Pellegrino" and "Howe" on them in huge, bold letters. Literally, there are thousands of these signs hung up in excess everywhere on campus.

The waste of time, money and paper is completely absurd. These candidates have the misconception that the more signs they put up, and the brighter the color is, then they'll win the election. They, however are decidedly wrong.

The more I see doors and poles coated with their names, the more strongly I refuse to vote for them. This ridiculous display must certainly break some sort of property defamation act. It seems now as if every bulletin board, window, door and telephone pole has a minimum of eight of their signs on it.

We should not be subjected to such propaganda that is a blatant attempt to brainwash students to vote for them. I was happy to see that one building on campus, which earlier in the day had had its entryway almost completely covered with signs, was rid of this nonsense only a few hours later. Apparently, this tactic of theirs is annoying more than just one person on campus. If Pellegrino and Howe want to win the elections, they should focus on getting their views about issues out to the entire student population and not to hang up as many signs as they possibly can. At least the other candidates posted their signs in reasonable numbers, listed more than just their names, and some even had their views on certain issues they planned to address.

The only way I did find out about Pellegrino and Howe's views (and what their first names were), was by a friend of mine who had unknowingly signed their nomination paper. They sent her a copy of their platform, which contained the same goals that candidates three years ago had promised to get accomplished. I find it sad that election campaigns, even at the student government level, mimic those of the federal government, where nothing is accomplished, important issues are conveniently danced around or outright avoided, and publicity is everything.

Smash mouth lead singer Steve Harwell asks "Why can't we be friends?" Wednesday night in Boston.

THIRD EYE BLIND / SMASH MOUTH / FAT
Orpheum Theatre
March 4

BOSTON — In this day and age of the mega-mogul music industry, most of the media we are exposed to is a bunch of one-hit wonders whose title song is only skin-deep. Recently, only one-hit wonders seem to be making names for themselves. The most popular sounds lately are ska (with poster children, the Mighty Mighty Bosstones) and easy listening feminine popsters like Jewel and Sarah McLachlan.

New groups seem to come and go like the tides ebb and flow. Surprising to most is the staying power of San Francisco's Third Eye Blind. The group's sound is nothing groundbreaking, but their message and musical chops are solid. Wednesday evening at the Orpheum Theatre, they brought the house down. The night featured co-headliners Smash mouth who put the "fun" back in rock.

According to Smash mouth bassist Paul De Lisle, "We're just out here to have a good time and bring a little bit of positivity back to music. I mean, people are getting sick of Marilyn Manson."

Coming out strong and filled with energy to spare, Smash mouth never let up in their fast and furious attack. Unfortunately, the crowd was fairly lackluster, with some rowdy patrons upstairs in the balcony accounting for what little mayhem there was.

Lead singer Steve Harwell helped get the early arrivals blood pumping by repeatedly asking if anybody was actually out there. There was, and the crowd quickly got back into the show. It was easy to understand why the crowd was out of it, as Smash mouth has very atypical sound.

Kissing not a strong Schwimmer

By Rob Roensch
Collegian Correspondent

KISSING A FOOL
Directed by Doug Ellin
with Jason Lee, David Schwimmer, and Mili Avital
Playing at Mountain Farms Theaters

Kissing a Fool is a typical romantic comedy, predictable and unevenly witty. That said, it is not without its charms.

The story, told in flashbacks, centers around Jay, a heartbroken writer (Jason Lee), who sets up his editor, Samantha (Mili Avital) with his best friend Max, a womanizing sportscaster (David Schwimmer). The obviously mismatched Max and Sam for some reason get engaged, and Max becomes paranoid that Sam will cheat on him. He enlists Jay to test her loyalty, but Jay only succeeds in falling in love with her. From there the plot is tangled and resolved in sitcom fashion.

The story is ordinary and the script is amusing but little else. The only way a movie can transcend these handicaps is through acting, and here the acting is almost enough.

The central character is played by Lee, who walked away with both Mallrats and Chasing Amy by saying inappropriate things much too loudly. He was funny in those movies because he was so obviously enjoying himself, an actor as a class clown rather than a comic "artist." He calms down here, and although his acting is tentative and he never seems to know what to do with his hands. His character is incredibly sympathetic because of Lee's simplicity and directness.

Lee gives up his place as scene stealer to Schwimmer, previously known for his sensitive, arrogant wuss on television's "Friends" and for his sad mook in the Pallbearer. Schwimmer abandons his nice guy persona and is reborn as a confident sleazebag with strangely shiny hair. Schwimmer has always had excellent timing and, in contrast to Lee, he moves like a well-oiled machine here. He says "What up?" at least 20 times during the movie, and it keeps getting funnier because Max has no idea how ridiculous Schwimmer is making him sound.

Mili Avital has a distinctive screen presence as the romantic heroine, unusually gentle and natural, but the movie gives her depressingly little to do. Samantha exists mostly as an object for the two men to argue about, but it is to Avital's credit that she is always interesting. Like the men, she makes the most of a thinly written role.

But all the well-meaning acting in the end can't stop the feeling that this story has been told before, and its been told much, much better. Still, I laughed every now and then, and that's always worth something. C

Two movie soundtracks that actually work

By Seema Gangatirkar

THE MAN IN THE IRON MASK
(original music composed by) Nick Glennie-Smith
Milan

TITANIC
(original music composed by) James Horner
Sony Classics

From the first note of the deeply sinister opening "Surrounded," the soundtrack to The Man in the Iron Mask sets itself up as a character score, imbuing the story with a sense of both passion and urgency.

Set in 1662, The Man in the Iron Mask requires music that complements both the heaviness of the baroque style along with the very beginnings of the rigidity of the classical period. With an original score written by Nick Glennie-Smith, The Man in the Iron Mask follows the classical tradition of music, with inspiration drawn from Handel. Following the rules of classical music implies a restraint and an orderliness in the compositions, and Glennie-Smith excels in the neo-classical style, adding just enough percussion and heavy brass lines to convey a sense of excitement in the music. Glennie-Smith also does not neglect the fact that the film actually takes place during the baroque period — a period of heavy emphasis on ornamentation and detached notes. He incorporates those ideas within the piece, but lightly enough not to interfere with the overwhelmingly classical style.

Unlike many soundtracks, The Man in the Iron Mask does not have one single, pervasive theme running through it. The music changes often, sometimes within a composition. From the intense blackness of "Surrounded," followed by the triumphant "Heart of King," the playful "The Pig Chase" and the solemn "King For A King," Glennie-Smith manages to convey an individualistic sense for each separate piece. Not that there aren't connecting moments within the music, but for the most part, each composition manages to stand by itself, reflecting mood and character themes, rather than an overwhelming focus.

From the fanfare of "The Masked Ball" to the melancholy "A Taste of Something," there is a freshness and a romanticism within the music that has been lacking in the past.

Titanic, the soundtrack, is an emotional appeal to the senses, a stirring and sweeping attempt. There is a simplicity in the music. From the plaintive "Never an Absolution" to the more energetic "Southampton," the emotions in the music run the gamut from joy to deep sadness and in the process stir up a feeling of grandeur. A soundtrack should complement the film and Titanic's does so beautifully. With a sweeping passion, the clear lines blend softly together. There are no discordant notes in Titanic and there are no abrupt changes in mood, each segment takes a mood and expands upon the idea.

Composed by James Horner, Titanic resonates with the ideas and the passions of the era, the excitement and fears of those aboard Titanic. Horner makes good use of synthesizer and vocals to complement the full orchestra in order to express those feelings.

Writing for a period piece often makes it difficult for the composer, simply because it is almost impossible to capture the exact flavor of the music from 85 years ago. Blending together the beginnings of the modern sound with help from synthesizers and a vocal accompaniment along with the dreamy themes of the romantic era, Horner makes the music resonate for that era as well as for this one.

Titanic, however, does not have many shifts in the musical theme itself. Its theme, most prevalent in "Rose" and "My Heart Will Go On" is the basis for most of the score. But it's hard to fault Titanic for relying so heavily on the romantic theme, especially when its softness does so much to help the story along and project the grandiose theme of Titanic. The Man In the Iron Mask— B+, Titanic— A

Music goes to the jungle on Goldie's latest; Ani DiFranco mixes up her style

COURTESY PHIL KNOTT

The king of jungle, Goldie, returns with Saturnzreturn, with help from KRS-One, David Bowie and Noel Gallagher.

SATURNZRETURN
Goldie
London/ffrr

Techno/hip–hop artist Goldie has often hailed as "the undisputed king of the jungle." Goldie does a more than adequate job of living up to this reputation with his latest release Saturnzreturn. Goldie's new 2–CD effort is best when he sticks to his formula of up–tempo bass and drums beats. He gets mixed results when he experiments with eretheral psychedelica which composes much of the first disc.

The only track on the first disc, "Mother," gets off to a false start but picks up before the listener loses interest, which is a good thing considering it's over an hour long. "Truth," which features David Bowie on vocals, scores points in all the right places. The second disc places Goldie in familiar territory of pounding bass and techno rhythms Noel Gallagher provides some guitar work on "Temper Temper" and KRS–One is featured on "Digital."

Saturnzreturn provides great jungle techno expected of Goldie. It also gives other material — some that works, some that does not. B (Kevin Monahan)

LITTLE PLASTIC CASTLE
Ani DiFranco
Righteous Babe

By this point, everybody pretty much knows Ani DiFranco's D.I.Y. success story, but for those who learned of DiFranco when one of their friends said "Who the hell is Ani DiFranco and why is she playing the Mullins Center?" a brief introduction is necessary.

Born in 1970 in Buffalo, N.Y., DiFranco began writing and performing music before the tender age of 10. By the time she was 20, DiFranco had already released a self–titled album of original songs on her own record label. Now, at 27, she's just released her ninth studio album, Little Plastic Castle.

This latest effort sees the righteous babe branching out of her firmly entrenched folk and punk roots into an unsettling period of maturation, not to mention a re–examination of herself ("Fuel"). Perhaps due to some mainstream exposure which opened her eyes to a whole new world of possibilities, DiFranco isn't content to simply play the folky punk anymore. Songs like the title track and "Deep Dish" even feature trumpets, trombones and saxophones. Go figure.

Initially, the album may sound a bit shallow and hollow due its slick production. Clearly, DiFranco works better when the production is kept to a minimum, allowing for her frank, in–your–face wit. Her powerful words are allowed to resonate, usually with only an acoustic guitar being strummed over a background drum beat. Not so with much of Little Plastic Castle. Instead, DiFranco tries a more subtle approach which often works — as on "As Is" and "Independence Day." Whatever route she takes though, DiFranco is a voice that's impossible to ignore. She will be heard.

While everything doesn't come up roses on Little Plastic Castle, give her credit for trying instead of resting on her laurels. B (Marty Keane)

EXILE ON COLDHARBOUR LANE
A3
Elemental/Geffen

Perhaps the year's most eclectic musical blend, A3's sound can only be described as a sleazy mix of blues, boogie and churchy choruses fueled by an acid trip. A brief listen to the album's best track, "Ain't Going Goa" bears this out.

The Very Reverend Dr. D. Wayne Love (there's a mouthful) and Larry Love have assembled a like–minded cadre of musicians who preach an almost holy platform of dubby bass throbs, eccentric harmonica blasts with honky– tonk irreverance. It all combines to make Exile On Coldharbour Lane a riotously fun, unpredictable roller coaster ride. B+ (M.K.)

MAVERICK A STRIKE
Finley Quaye
550 Music

Having the stigma attached to you of "being Tricky's uncle" can't be a good thing. Reality must be a tough pill to swallow if you're Finley Quaye, then, I suppose.

While both traverse in putting together hallucinatory soundscapes filled with dope–addled grooves and blunted out rhythms, Quaye is quite different from his more famous nephew, for now at least.

The excellent Maverick A Strike is closer to Philly soul than trip–hop, and the rejoicing nature that permeates almost all of his debut shows why Quaye is a talent to behold. His vocals are almost Rastafarian and, clearly taking a page out of Bob Marley's playbook, the songs a glorious reaffirmation of urban life.

"It's Great When We're Together" and "Ride On and Turn the People On" are both exceptional songs because of Quaye's ability to preach to his listeners in an irresistibly charismatic and righteous manner, devoid of any pretensions. Music lover's rejoice! Quaye's Maverick A Strike is what we've been waiting for — an album with no filler. A (M.K.)

HARD QUESTIONS
Linee
Stick Girl

The elements have to be in good order for Linee Perroncel's brilliance to come across on record, and these elements include a fine rhythm section, an earnest zeal for self–expression, and above all, Linee's powerful voice.

The strum–along quality of the songs on Hard Questions lead them either into beautifully affecting folk–rock moments or unfortunate meandering ruts. In "I'm No Angel," bassist Frank Rozelle and drummer Mark Kislus remain, as always, respectfully nondescript as Linee makes a bald emotional appeal to the listener: "I can't walk this road again of unrequited fire." The effect of this disarmingly simple tune and scathing vocal delivery is wonderful. "King's Highway" is a plaintive, open song which features Linee dealing with confused desire in a different and equally satisfying way.

But songs such as "Ease Your Weary Head" find Linee breathlessly trying to cram lines into verses over a dull musical accompaniment, before she saves the song with a beautiful chorus featuring her flawless harmonies. Problems such as these are frustrating, and unfortunately frequent. Linee works best at her least monotonous. Ironically, Linee sings: "My life's a picture of blood and rain / A boring book, an open refrain."

On Hard Questions, it seems that too much rain has diluted the blood. C (Michael Telles)

NAKED BABY PHOTOS
Ben Folds Five
Caroline

Currently storming up the charts on the backs of "Brick," Naked Baby Photos is an album for those who need a little catching up with the piano–driven pop of this Chapel Hill, N.C. trio.

Comprised of leftover tracks from their debut album and several live offerings, the album's centerpiece is the original 7–inch version of the first–ever BFF song, "Jackson Cannery."

The live tracks each showcase the vibrancy of their raucous live shows, especially the borderline misogynist humor of "Song For the Dumped" and the outright hilarity of "Satan is My Master."

While much of the material is nowhere near the quality of Whatever and Ever Amen, Naked Baby Photos nonetheless manages to be an album of effortlessly entertaining tracks and self–effacing humor that underlies some consistently tuneful and clever songs. B– (M.K.)

WORD GETS AROUND
Stereophonics
V2

Made up of three boyhood friends from the same small South Wales town — Kelly Jones, Richard Jones and Stuart Cable — Stereophonics have dutifully taken their number in the long queue of Britpop wannabes.

Judging from the results on their debut, Word Gets Around, they'd better be prepared to wait a long while before anybody calls that number. It's not that they don't have talent — they play their instruments well and sound good enough — but it's simply a paint–by–numbers approach to a fairly innocuous blend of Britpop (the kind Cast and Ocean Colour Scene play).

Honestly, nothing on Word Gets Around merits much attention, and barely a second listen: not even "More Life in a Tramp's Vest," which describes the tedium of a job at a fruit and vegetable stand. Yawn. C– (M.K.)

Trax On Trax Off

COURTESY MICHAEL LAVINE

England's A3 have created a curious brew of acid house and techno on their eclectic debut.

■ show

"Walkin' On the Sun" (featuring a mini–Coke parody), and "Why Can't We Be Friends" all provided endless listening enjoyment.

Not only did Third Eye Blind have the energy of Smash mouth, they tripled it. Third Eye Blind is a band, which, like most bands, traverse in simple guitar, bass drums and lead vocals. Nothing special — the fancy part was their musical content.

Front man Stephen Jenkins on a number of occasions said: "Why do any of you want to hear a band like us?" He felt that their dark sound shouldn't be popular.

The last time Third Eye Blind came to Boston, they played in the cramped confines of the 800–capacity Paradise Rock Club. That show wasn't even sold out.

After only a couple of months after their self–titled debut hit the shelves, their "cult" status has gone full–blown mainstream. They have staying power and the records to prove it. In fact, their first single, "Semi–Charmed Life," spent 20 weeks on Billboard's Hot 100 singles chart.

It was refreshing to see that a band, which is making money hand over fist can prove that they are mortal. Jenkins said many times that he was having fun and that the fans made it all worth it. While it's easy for many to make such a statement, Jenkins and his mates obviously weren't kidding as the band returned for three unscheduled encores.

The current tour wraps up at the end of this month. De Lisle says that "after that we'll be going back over to Europe for a month and then come back to the states and maybe do our own tour."

Fat opened the evening's proceedings up with a typically loud, obnoxious and razor–edged blend of straightforward rock. Too bad those blades were dull. They were definitely not a very impressive outfit.

two points.

UMass will need to stop Maine forwards Shawn Wansburough and Steve Karlya, two of the elite players in Hockey East. In addition, the Minutemen will need to get by Alfie Michaud, who the Minutemen could not solve up in Orono.

However, the Black Bears will be hungry in their regular season finale. Maine fell to Nebraska–Omaha 4–3 in its last contest, and will look for some momentum heading into the Hockey East playoffs.

On the UMass side of things, the Minutemen have not been generating offense as of late. UMass has only scored three goals in its last three games, and has been struggling on the offensive end throughout the season.

Senior goaltender Brian Regan had been playing well, but he gave up five goals against Boston College on Wednesday night and was pulled in favor of Markus Helanen. However, Regan should be up to the task against Maine, knowing that the contest could mark his final 60 minutes of collegiate hockey if UMass falls.

Saturday night's game will also be Senior Night for the departing Minutemen. The class of 1998 includes Regan, Dan Judeen, Chris Fawcett, Tom O'Connor, Dean Campanale, Mike Gaffney and Lovell, who transferred to UMass after his junior year.

UMass will look towards not only those seven players, but the entire roster to help them it two points. Should the Minutemen reach the playoffs, they will face either Boston University or Boston College in the Hockey East quarterfinals next weekend.

It should be a dandy. Sixty minutes will determine an entire season. Will the Minutemen sink or swim?

We'll just have to wait and see.

turnovers — everything really — seemed to go against Massachusetts in those five minutes. GW coach Mike Jarvis claimed that's what won the Colonials the game.

"We got quicker in the second half," Jarvis said. "We were getting to balls that UMass usually gets to."

Jarvis thought UMass was tired, and that it hurt the Minutemen in the second half.

But Flint didn't agree. He thought GW just beat them to every loose ball in crunch time and that, along with strong contributions from the Colonial bench, was the difference.

Flint insists there really isn't much to this losing skid. Shots aren't falling, guys aren't getting to loose balls, etc. Yes, not winning the Atlantic 10, UMass' main goal all season, is a disappointment he said.

Now the focus is on the NCAA tournament. UMass was in weeks ago, so yesterday's loss won't affect that. There isn't much concern in the UMass camp. The Minutemen will take their week off, rest up, and if they can't write a happy ending to their conference season here in Philadelphia, they'll try and write a happy ending to their season in the NCAA tournament.

But unless they get back on track, and fast, there won't be a happy ending. It won't matter what their RPI ranking was, what their AP ranking was, where they were seeded or who they played.

If UMass can't get back to what got them into the NCAA tournament — that (Refuse to Lose) attitude UMass basketball is famous for — none of that will matter. Because they'll be in the position they were in last night. Heading back to Amherst, heads hung low, wondering what could have been. Knowing the party is going on without them.

and should log plenty of time on the hill for UMass this year.

Oh, and by the way, the underclassmen aren't too shabby, either.

Catcher Brian Samela returns behind the plate for his junior season after a sophomore campaign which saw him belt eight homers and 35 RBI to go along with a .338 average. Bryan Mazzaferro moves over to shortstop after seeing significant action at third base in 1997, a season in which he finished second on the team in hitting with a .400 average.

Aaron Braunstein is back patrolling left field for UMass, and will look to continue to emerge as an imposing offensive threat. Braunstein left the yard 14 times in 1997 and drove in 49 RBI to go along with a .351 average. Sophomore Shaun Skeffington will also see action as the designated hitter, and should use his speed to cause some problems for opponents.

Redshirt freshman Gavin Clark and freshmen Nick Gorneau and Steve Fiste should also see action for the Minutemen this season.

The rest of the pitching staff will also be formidable, as junior southpaw Bill Cooke and junior righty Ryan Cameron will be starters for the Minutemen. Cooke was 6–2 in 1997, while Cameron finished up with a 4–0 mark.

Others who Stone expects see action will be sophomore Travis Vracka, who was 4–3 as a freshman, and newcomers Nick Skirkanich, Jason Grecheika, David Loonie and Craig Szado.

UMass reached the NCAA East Regionals in 1996, but fell just short last season after falling to Virginia Tech in the A–10 tournament. Stone hopes that this year will bring a return to the promised land for the Minutemen.

"We want to win the A–10 tourney and move onto the NCAAs. That's one of our goals, but we have a lot of work to do before we get there," Stone said.

But for now, the Minutemen have been scrimmaging Amherst College in effort to prepare for their season opener, which will be tonight at 7 p.m. against the University of South Florida in Tampa.

Cooke is expected to open things up tonight with the first pitch. Barnsby will start Saturday's 1 p.m. matchup, and Cameron is slotted to pitch in relief on Friday as well as open on Sunday at 1 p.m.

"They're going 65 pitches or three innings, whatever comes first," Stone said. "There are a number of guys who will also see work."

The Bulls have not fared well since their season began at Florida International on Jan. 29. After a tough 3–2 loss, they have compiled a 7–11 record. Their season has been a mix of ups and downs, as they sagged to a 0–3 start before beating Miami 15–2 on Feb. 1. South Florida's last game was a staggering 17–7 loss on Tuesday to Jacksonville.

"This weekend is more for our guys to get work," Stone said. "Hopefully they will pitch well and will give us the opportunity to win the ballgames."

Happy Three Years

Major challenge awaits as men's tennis heads south

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's tennis team will have its hands full this weekend as it faces three premier tennis programs in the course of two days.

After last year's smashing success, Massachusetts coach Judy Dixon improved the quality of the schedule by adding teams the program had never faced before.

The transformation will not be more evident than this weekend, when the squad heads southward to face Bloomsberg and George Washington on Saturday. UMass will then face Maryland at College Park on Sunday.

"This is the biggest weekend of tennis this program has ever seen," Dixon said. "We have three tough teams lined up one after another, and we must be prepared."

The Minutemen have lived for adversity over the past few seasons, so it is only fitting that No. 1 singles player Todd Cheney has come down with bronchitis.

"Todd has played sick and through pain many times for us," Dixon said. "I am not worried for him, but it is always better when all of our guys are healthy."

Furthermore, Jason Lin, who played at No. 3 doubles this spring, has left the team and will be replaced by Kevin Curley in the lineup immediately.

"We must move on and make due with the lineup we have," Dixon said. "The doubles play has been coming around, and I am confident Kevin will step in and play well for us."

George Washington appears to be a main target for the Minutemen this weekend because of the Colonials' Atlantic 10 standing.

Currently GW places at third in the conference behind Virginia Tech and Temple. UMass fell to the experienced Temple team earlier this season, 6–1.

"We competed well against Temple, as did GW," Dixon said. "Therefore, a win over them makes us that much more credible in the A–10 picture."

The only concerns Dixon seems to have regard fatigue. Long practices and the tougher schedule have taken their toll on the team.

Nevertheless, the Minutemen appear to have plenty of fire left for the grueling weekend that awaits them.

"I love the competition," No. 4 singles player Parsa Samii said. "We have so much incentive to play well when we are up against these types of opponents. This team plays even better when we are underdogs, so I think we will be alright."

Minutemen is their team health. The rigors of the long season have started to take their toll on the team.

Included on the proverbial waiting list at the infirmary is Toye, who is still nursing a strained muscle, and Carrara, who has been battling a sinus infection for almost a month. Freshman Marc Sylvander had to be removed from the mile relay because of a hamstring pull suffered one week ago.

"It's at the end of the year when the kids are experiencing some down time," O'Brien said. "Everyone's running into the flu. People get some aches and pains or, really, strains. We'd like to be where we were two weeks ago when we hadn't been through all of this."

All in all, however, the meet looks to be an exciting one, and each athlete will try for one last time to achieve a NCAA qualifying time or distance that will lengthen the season one week.

"When you get kids from 90 schools at the same time and the same place running all their best times, you can imagine what's going to happen. It's a great competition," O'Brien said.

Spectacular six off to compete in the ECACs

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's indoor track and field stars are facing what might be for many their last meet of the winter season. The women are heading for the ECACs, a meet in which an athlete must qualify to participate.

For UMass, six athletes will compete at this meet. The number of qualifiers from UMass was originally seven, but Rebecca Donaghue will not run due to a shin injury.

"I feel it would be best if I checked it out with a doctor first, before I injure it any further," Donaghue said.

As for the rest of the UMass entries, they will run, and many have set very high goals for this meet.

Shelanda Irish will be competing in the 200m and the long jump, which she qualified for at her last meet. Irish has set very high goals for this meet, and she is hoping her knee injury will not be an issue.

"We're running on a very fast track [Reggie Lewis Track in Boston] and my goals are to hopefully break the school records in both the long jump and the 200m," Irish said.

Irish also set a goal of qualifying for the nationals provisionally. Currently Irish needs 7 feet–3/4–inch on her best jump to qualify.

Rosey Bryan also has qualified for two events at the ECACs, the triple jump and the 55m hurdles. Bryan is hoping to be able to qualify for nationals in her events, but she knows that the competition at this meet will be very tough.

"Some of the toughest teams in the country will be here, but I'm real up for this meet and to run against these great runners," Bryan said.

The big hopeful for UMass in the 1000m is Nicole Way. She has been running well the last couple of meets, and hope to continue to do so.

"This is my first ECAC and I'm very excited to be running in it. I feel confident and strong," Way said.

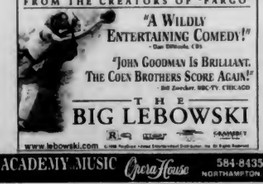
Way has been running personal bests in the last couple of races, and hopes to continue that trend at ECACs.

Shana Mitchell is expected to do well for UMass in the 20–pound weight. Mitchell has been throwing well, and is looking forward to seeing some of the tough competition that she has seen at A–10s and New Englands.

"I look forward to competing against Beth Hart from Connecticut again, and get another look at Northeastern and Virginia Tech," Mitchell said.

Also competing at this meet for UMass will be Silfa Kenku in the 400m. She has been running great times at all the big meets this season and has become somewhat of a clutch runner.

Andrea Corneau will compete in one of the more gruelling events the pentathlon. This is an event that she has been preparing for and looking forward to for a long time.



"I know my athletes are prepared and that they want to go out and give it 110 percent, and they can accomplish anything," said Massachusetts coach Julie LaFreniere.

Justice served? The price is right for some

The decision has come in. The decision by a certain arbiter by the name of John Feerick that is. Feerick ruled this week that suspended Golden State Warrior Latrell Sprewell was to have the termination of his contract overturned and his suspension reduced to five months.

Instead of being suspended for the entire year, Sprewell will be reinstated as of July 1 and become $16.3 million richer. This, after physically assaulting his coach, P.J. Carlesimo, and initially being suspended for a year by NBA commissioner David Stern.

Sprewell and the NBA Players Association received a favorable decision, in part, because other players supported Sprewell due to the abuse they say they also suffered under Carlesimo. Among them, Isaiah Rider and one of the best players in the game, Rod Strickland.

Neither of these players may have perfect records either, but what is important is how Sprewell will act after he returns. Sprewell, not noted as being the most generous player in the league, will have to change his selfish attitude if he hopes to turn his obvious talent into an NBA career.

• With the Sonic's 97–91 overtime win over the Heat on Tuesday, Seattle snapped Miami's 10–game winning streak and strengthened their position as the best team in the league. Coming on strong however, have been the Chicago Bulls, who have seen improved play from Scottie Pippen.

Watch the Spurs for a late run if center David Robinson can successfully return from an inflamed knee that caused him to miss six games. No matter how San Antonio finishes, however, they can look forward to Sean Elliot's possible return next season after being injured for most of this year.

• Let us pause for a moment and lament the plight of the Denver Nuggets. For those who know Boston Celtic basketball, we have seen a strong resurgence organized by head coach Rick Pitino and the new–found leadership of Antoine Walker after last year's regrettable campaign.

Still, that light may be a little further away for the cellar– dwellers from the Rocky Mountain State who have managed to compile an embarrassing 3–54 record, are 40 games out in the West, have gone 1–29 on the road, and have lost 12 straight. If that's not a case for an automatic No. 1 draft pick, I don't know what is.

• On the other end of the success totem pole is Patriot running back Curtis Martin, who may find his next contract more to his liking than the $247,500 he earned last year. With fellow Pat Willie McGinest recently signing on for five years at $25 million, New England seems intent on retaining its star players. Although Martin has already rejected a six–year, $20 million dollar deal, the Patriots have about $7 million to spare under the salary cap and may restructure Drew Bledsoe's deal if necessary.

• Former Eagle running back Ricky Watters recently switched clubs, signing a four–year pact worth $13 million with Seahawks. Surprisingly coming over to Philadelphia after winning the NFL Championship with the 49ers in 1995, Watters averaged over 1,200 yards and 10 touchdowns a year for the Eagles despite problems with management which stemmed from the back's complaints of not having a large enough role in the offense. With Watters' role remaining a large issue it is likely Chris Warren is on his way out.

• Also moving, this time a return move, was another running back, Natrone Means. Means returned to the Chargers, signing a six–year, $19.1 million dollar deal. Both concluded there were no hard feelings between the parties after San Diego released Means two years ago. With the retirement of former quarterback Stan Humphries, Means should become quickly become a key offensive component for the Chargers.

• The price may not be right for Brave second baseman Mark Lemke. Lemke, offered a contract in the $200,000 range by the Boston Red Sox, would be taking a substantial cut in pay to leave a team bolstered with deep talent and positioned for a chance at going to the World Series.

This caused Brave cornerman Chipper Jones to describe the offer as a "little slap in the face." The Red Sox will have to up the ante if they expect to gain a quality second baseman before the start of the season.

• Announced this Sunday will be the selections and seedings for the 64–team NCAA tournament. The Atlantic 10 has the opportunity to possibly claim six spots, which would

PHILADELPHIA— The Massachusetts men's basketball team's vacation in the City of Brotherly Love ended abruptly yesterday as the West No. 2 seed George Washington Colonials battled back from an eight–point second–half deficit to upend UMass, 88–83.

Massachusetts moves to 21–10, and expects to be selected into the NCAA tournament this Sunday. GW (23–7) will now take on East No. 1 seed Temple tonight in the tournament semifinals.

The Minutemen matched their biggest lead of the game at 15:02 of the second half, following a Monty Mack baseline layup. But UMass lost the game in the next six minutes, as the Colonials went on a 19–5 run to pull ahead for good, 58– 52. GW guard Shawnta Rogers was the biggest reason for the momentum change, scoring seven points during the run. Rogers finished with a game–high 28 points, 12 of which came from the free throw line in the second half.

"The kid was all over the floor," Massachusetts coach Bruiser Flint said. "That's what big time players do."

With just under eight minutes to play, UMass got back into the game with a 7–2 run. Lari Ketner scored two baskets, and Mack added a pair of free throws to pull to 62– 60. But Ajmal Basit could only convert on one of two free throws on the next possession — cutting the lead to a point — and the Minutemen were unable to complete the comeback effort.

GW answered with a quick 11–2 run highlighted by a pair of three–pointers from Rogers and Yegor Mescherlakov, and a long–range jumper by Rogers.

"Shawnta Rogers continues to amaze me," George Washington coach Mike Jarvis said. "He's our most valuable player with how mentally tough he is."

"I like to think that that was an entertaining game. Our kids don't quit, their kids don't quit," continued Jarvis. "That's why the GW–UMass game is always exciting."

Chris Kirkland, Charlton Clarke, and Mack each hit threes in a desperate final minute comeback, but it wasn't enough.

UMass led at halftime, 38–34, and opened the second half with a 4–0 run. The Minutemen led by as many as six in the first half.

Mack broke out of his funk by scoring 10 of his team–high 24 points in the first half.

With Tyrone Weeks out for most of the game with a sore left ankle and knee, UMass was out–rebounded by GW, 35– 28. But the most revealing statistic of the game came at the charity stripe. GW went to the line 48 times, the third highest in tournament history, and converted on 32, the eighth highest. The Colonials hit 21–of–32 in the second half.

During GW's stretch run, Ketner — who was the most dominating figure in the first half with 10 point — was not a factor. GW coach Mike Jarvis attributed this to play of big man Patrick Ngongba.

"Do you see the pipes on him," Jarvis said, referring to Ngongba's physique. "Patrick just put a little pipe on him."

Ngongba's "pipes" didn't do quite the job throughout the game though — Ketner finished with 22 points, four rebounds, and a pair of blocks.

UMass' NCAA destiny will be revealed this Sunday at 6 p.m. Flint was confident that the team's 21 wins would be more than enough to earn them a berth.

"We've got the highest RPI in the league. I feel very comfortable," Flint said.

Minutemen need to get back on track quickly

Luke Meredith

PHILADELPHIA — The No. 23 Massachusetts men's basketball team is fast fulfilling the prophecy critics laid out for it in October. It is perilously close to becoming an Atlantic 10 also–ran.

For the second straight season UMass' A–10 title hopes were dashed in the quarterfinals, with yet another loss to George Washington. Symptomatic of the team's late season slide, yesterday's 88–83 loss stings, even with an NCAA tournament bid already locked up.

Massachusetts has now lost four of six heading into the NCAA tournament next weekend, and after starting 9–0 in conference, UMass finished up a very sluggish 4–5. UMass coach Bruiser Flint had said all season the main goal of the 1997–98 season was to win back the A–10 title, hopes that fell by the wayside over the last few weeks.

The slide started against Temple at the William D. Mullins Center, where the Owls blew the Minutemen out, 61–47, back on Feb. 3. They then lost double overtime games to Rhode Island and St. Bonaventure, and blew the A–10 regular season title last Sunday across town at the Apollo of Temple.

What was once a dream season is turning sour pretty quickly and the A–10's annual party will once again go on without them.

This one was a shootout, a game UMass hates to play. But the Minutemen were in control — thanks to another monster game from Lari Ketner. UMass was up 47–39 early in the second half, and was playing some of its best ball in weeks. But for teams in a slump things never seem to work out the way they planned.

GW made its push, like a good team will, and before UMass pushed back it was too late. The Colonials cut the lead to three, then finally took the lead at 50–49. UMass couldn't buy a basket during the five–minute stretch midway through the second half. When all was said and done, UMass was down 56–49, and GW was on its way to the semifinals. The loose balls, the

Hockey faces must–win situation against Maine

By Michael Kobylanski

At this point, the first 31 games of the 1997–98 season mean nothing to the Massachusetts hockey team.

All that matters right now is tomorrow night's 7 p.m. faceoff against the University of Maine at the William D. Mullins Center (WMUA–FM).

With a win against the Black Bears and a Merrimack loss to Boston University, the Minutemen would qualify for the Hockey East playoffs.

"It's real simple. It's do or die on Saturday night," Massachusetts coach Joe Mallen said. "Maine is going to be a good team coming in. If we want to be in the playoffs, then we've got to win a 60 minute game, and if we can't, then we're done."

Should the aforementioned scenario occur on Saturday, it would be a great accomplishment considering all of the adversity that UMass has faced this season, including starting 0–10–1 in its Hockey East campaign. The Minutemen didn't win their first conference game until a Jan. 30 win over Providence.

Also included were injuries to Jeff Turner, Tim Hirsch, and Steve MacKinnon, and the departure of co–captain Brad Norton to the Detriot Vipers of the International Hockey League. And most recently, there was the suspension of Tim Lovell.

Yes, it has been a tumultuous haul for the Minutemen, but all it takes is a total team effort for 60 minutes on Saturday night against Maine, and all of those bad times will be forgotten.

The Black Bears spanked UMass by a combined two–game tally of 18–3 back on the weekend of Feb. 13 and 14 in Orono, Maine. The Minutemen were totally outplayed in that series, but will need to step up against an erratic Maine squad in order to pick up the necessary

There aren't too many college baseball teams across the country that wouldn't like to be in the shoes of the Massachusetts baseball team.

After finishing up the 1997 season with a 35–12 mark, the Minutemen return 18 players from that Atlantic 10 East Division championship squad, and have a solid crop of freshmen who are ready to contribute.

"We've been practicing really well, and we're getting as ready as we can for the start of the season," Massachusetts coach Mike Stone said. "We've made it out on the turf [at Richard F. Garber Field] and that's made it easier on us. We've got off to a good start, and we've got to continue to do well."

Leading the way for UMass this year will be co–captains Doug Clark and Scott Barnsby. Clark, a junior center fielder, hit .415 with 60 RBI as a sophomore and was named All–American by the National Collegiate Baseball Writers Association. Barnsby, a senior right–hander, was 6–1 with a 4.66 earned run average last year, and will be the ace of the Minutemen staff in 1998.

The Minutemen will also have a plethora of experience throughout their starting lineup. Second baseman Michie Dagliere in a four–year starter for UMass, and was also named All–American by the NCBWA in 1997, despite being troubled with injuries throughout the year. Fellow classmate Matt Wolcott will get the nod at the hot corner after a 1997 season in which he hit .288 with 18 walks.

Northbridge native Pete Gautreau is also one to watch for the Minutemen. The right fielder hit .374 with 11 homers and 46 RBI in 1997, and will provide valuable experience for UMass.

Senior pitcher Jeff Puleri will be the only other member of the class of 1998 on this year's squad. Puleri had a solid campaign in 1997, going 4–1 with a 5.02 ERA.

UMass harriers off to Ithaca for IC4As

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

This weekend at Cornell University in Ithaca, N.Y., 90 collegiate indoor track teams coming from as far south as Virginia and Duke, as far north as Maine, and as far west as Notre Dame, will gather to find out who the fastest, strongest and most agile athletes are among them.

This annual clash of the titans is known as the IC4A championships. Among the intimidatingly huge quantity of squads represented there is the Massachusetts men's Indoor track and field team.

Since specific times and distances are needed to qualify to reach this prentigious level, only the best of the best are invited.

The Minutemen who made the cut are as follows: senior Scott Price in the 55m and 200m; juniors Tom Toye and Neil Concepcion in the 400m; senior Dave Cahill in the 500m; senior Ryan Carrara in the 3000m; junior Ben Baraldi in the 55m high hurdles; junior Jan Stevens in the shot put; and both the 4x400m relay and the 4x800m relay teams.

Going for UMass is its team experience level. Because the group is mostly upperclassmen, the magnitude of the opposition will not rattle the Massachusetts athletes.

"Most of these kids have been there before," Massachusetts coach Ken O'Brien said. "Oftentimes if the competitor hasn't been to this level of competition before, the meet becomes strictly a learning experience. Our guys this year all have seen this level before.

"Toye and Price both placed last year in the 200m. We're looking for similar performances again this year."

Netanyahu to present four point peace plan

LONDON (AP) — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu characterized yesterday's talks with his British counterpart as "very positive," but was noncommittal about whether his four–nation European tour had provided hope of reviving Middle East peace talks.

Netanyahu was expected to present Tony Blair with a four–point plan to try to advance the peace process. He was reluctant, however, to answer questions when he emerged from Blair's No. 10 Downing Street office.

Details of the 90–minute meeting should be kept confidential "right now," Netanyahu told reporters. "It was actually a very positive and businesslike discussion."

Blair said good–bye at the door and did not talk to reporters. A Downing Street spokesman, speaking on customary condition of anonymity, said Blair and Netanyahu discussed British assistance on economic issues including a Gaza Strip airport, industrial park and seaport as well as a route linking the West Bank and Gaza.

McDougal, 57, dies in Fort Worth hospital

FORT WORTH, Texas (AP) — James McDougal, one of most important cooperating witnesses in Kenneth Starr's Whitewater investigation of President Clinton and first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton, died yesterday at a Fort Worth hospital. He was 57.

The Clintons' former business partner was the owner of an Arkansas savings and loan and the architect of a series of fraudulent loans and land deals that he alleged the president and first lady were aware of.

McDougal's death will significantly alter the complexion of the Whitewater investigation. After they got word of McDougal's death yesterday afternoon, Starr and his deputies were in a meeting at their Washington offices that was still in progress after several hours. McDougal died in a federal medical prison. He had suffered a variety of ailments, including heart disease and blocked arteries, but the medical examiner did not immediately state the cause of death. He was serving a three–year prison and his deputies for fraud. McDougal's death means the Clintons no longer face the prospect of their former real estate partner giving damaging testimony against them. While he testified extensively to the Whitewater grand jury in Little Rock and has been cooperating with Starr since August 1996, McDougal's death means he is no longer a threat as a witness in a courtroom or an impeachment inquiry against the president.

SGA pulls three from election

By Jason Eiseman
Collegian Staff

The night before elections, two candidates for Student Government

Dan Parker

Association (SGA) president, and one candidate for student trustee were removed from the ballot of the SGA elections for campaigning improprieties, including improperly accepting campaign funds and disobeying flyering rules, at an emergency meeting of the Election Commission.

Jen Casasanto and Dan Parker, candidates for president, and Erik Hansen, candidate for trustee, had their campaigns invalidated, at the impromptu meeting held at nine o'clock in the SGA office, last night.

Jen Casasanto was accused of accepting campaign money from Brian Tirrell, SGA Student Trustee. According to Elly Court, candidate for student trustee, Tirrell admitted to her that he was only staying in the election long enough to give Jen $100 of his $300, which is allocated for the campaign of every candidate.

She was also accused of not getting approval for a poster she put up. Members of the election commission said both issues were considered, but the posters alone were enough to invalidate her candidacy.

Court said Tirrell told her he was dropping out of the election right after SGA President Lia Wong had already signed a purchase order (P.O.) for campaign money. The P.O. was brought forth by Casasanto.

Erik Hansen

Casasanto said the action of the committee was unconstitutional, and unfair.

"I had no notice of this hearing," Casasanto said. "You must have a written warning, then a suspension. My campaign was invalidated tonight with no written warning."

Seth Presser of the Election Commission said the constitution says nothing about which penalties to enforce and that it is at the discretion of the commission. Presser said the commission decided at the beginning of the election that they would not give out any warnings.

Casasanto brought a complaint against the presidential campaign of Amy Pellegrino and trustee Jeff Howe. Justin Smith, a UMass alumnus, and a close friend of Casasanto, said he allegedly had pictures of two men tearing down Casasanto campaign posters in a residence hall in Northeast residential area.

He drove down from Vermont yesterday morning and allegedly saw two men tearing down Casasanto's posters. Smith said he followed them through the residence hall, moving through the halls taking pictures of them. He said he asked the men if they were with the Pellegrino campaign, and they allegedly answered 'yes'.

He brought the roll of film to the Howe said, he and Pellegrino specifically told their campaign workers not to rip down anyone's posters.

SGA debate during calm before storm; issues raised

By Victoria Groves
Collegian Staff

In the midst of yet another scandal, Student Government Association (SGA) President and Trustee candidates met for a panel debate last night in the UVC–19 Studio at the University of Massachusetts.

Candidates addressed the cameras and a small audience according to the office they were seeking and were allowed an opening and closing statement as well as an opportunity to answer questions from a panel of journalists from UVC– 19, WMUA, FM 91.1 and The Massachusetts Daily Collegian. The questions asked regarded concerns of the entire campus community as well as more internal problems within SGA.

All candidates support the recent tuition rollback for in– state students at the University and said that they will work to include out–of–state students in this endeavor as well.

"I was very involved in the tuition rollback... I think we definitely have to work with the state legislature to lower out–of–state tuition as well," trustee candidate Eleanor Court said.

Trustee candidates were also asked how they plan to have an impact on Board of Trustee decisions if they are unable to vote. Student trustees vote on an alternating cycle between the five UMass branches; the Amherst branch will be without a vote in the upcoming academic year.

"One way to influence legislature is to make students interested and your voice becomes a lot stronger. You may not have a vote, but you have the right to advocate," Jeffrey Howe, trustee candidate said.

"I'm going to join as many committees as I can. We need to get our voices heard even if we don't have a vote," Eric Magazu, trustee candidate said.

Currently, professors on campus retiring or leaving the university and not being replaced in the same numbers, leaving students with larger classes and scheduling difficulties. Originally designed to cut costs, candidates were asked how they could remedy this situation to benefit students.

"The decrease in professors is a countrywide movement. Students are sitting in classes with twice as many students... we need to mobilize students and inform them that this is an issue that needs to be addressed," Brenda Fitzpatrick, trustee candidate said.

The current image of the SGA was also addressed and candidates were asked to outline their plans for improving their productivity.

"We need new blood in SGA. [We need] people who are there to help students, not for their own vices,"

A look at SGA candidates

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Editor's note: Last night, the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association held an emergency meeting which resulted in the removal of three candidates. Jen Casasanto and Dan Parker were removed from the presidential ballot. Erik Hansen was taken off the ballot for trustee. At the time of print, SGA was deciding on the possible removal of two more candidates, running mates Amy Pellegrino for president and Jeff Howe for trustee (See above story).

In total, nine candidates are running. One candidate, Evan Rozantes is running independently for trustee while the remaining candidates are running in pairs.

The following is a summary of the candidates running in the SGA election for president and trustee. UMass students can vote today and tomorrow. On–campus students can vote in any dining common and commuter students may vote in the Student Union or the Newman Center. All polling centers are open 11 a.m.–2 p.m. and again from 4–7 p.m.

Salwa Shamapande for SGA President Eleanor Court for SGA Trustee

Sophomore Computer Systems Engineering major, Salwa Shamapande started his college government career by working as an administrative assistant to former SGA president, Maurice Caston.

Shamapande is now the Secretary of University Policy of the SGA. In the past Shamapande has worked with the Black Student Union and Nummo News.

Shamapande said the main issue of his candidacy for the SGA presidency is the Course And Teacher Evaluation (CATE) guide.

"It's the issue I've spent most of the semester on. At the end of

Amy Pellegrino for SGA President Jeffrey Howe for SGA Trustee

Amy Pellegrino, a sophomore political science and history major has been involved with the SGA for two years.

In her first year, Pellegrino was on the women's issues committee and select arts and was an advocate for Title VII. Pellegrino has also served as the Women's Issues chairperson and on the Ways and Means committee.

If elected as SGA president Pellegrino would work to support Registered Student Organizations (RSO) by alleviating the overcrowding in RSO offices.

"I would work on space allocation. You have things like Hillel, Theater Guild and Massachusetts Public Interest

Phillip Blue for SGA President Eric Magazu for SGA Trustee

Phillip Blue, a junior Bachelors with Individual Concentration (BDIC) major concentrating in Information Systems, worked his way up through the SGA ranks over the past year.

Starting as a house council representative last year, Blue is now a house council president and a SGA Senator.

If elected SGA president, Blue will focus on issues including the 24–hour security in dorms, bringing new channels to the housing services cable system, expanding the escort service and making registration easier for students with undeclared majors.

"I would like to roll back the 24–hour security to times posted

Evan Rozantes for SGA Trustee

Evan Rozantes, a sophomore School of Management finance major, became interested in running for student trustee to get the public more involved in the SGA.

If elected student trustee, Rozantes plans to work on parking issues, the quality of dining common food, 24–hour computer labs and library hours and getting rid of the "generic" channels on housing cable.

To help students get to class easier after parking, Rozantes would like to provide a shuttle service.

"I would like to see a shuttle service. It takes about

Jesse Burchfield for SGA President Brenda Fitzpatrick for SGA Trustee

Jesse Burchfield, a junior legal studies major with a basis in activism started off his government experience at the top.

Burchfield was appointed Attorney General of the SGA six months ago after activism within the Sierra Club and the Human Rights Club.

He has formed detailed plans that have been worked out concerning customer service in Whitmore, the CATE Guide and SGA reorganization.

Burchfield has a three–step plan to make Whitmore easier to use for students if elected SGA president.

"First, we plan to establish a 1–800 number like the one every semester each student does an evaluation and gives it to the SGA or whoever we decide should handle it. Then it will be posted on the internet... It's an idea based on customer service," Shamapande said.

Differed maintenance is also high on Shamapande's priority list on a basis of "Fix what you broke."

"I like to put it as 'fix what you broke.' There is $393 million dollars worth of differed maintenance. This is something that won't be accomplished in a year. Next year is an election year [for the state legislature]. We need to put in someone that this is a high priority. My part would be to register students to vote to put pressure on state legislatures to care about this," Shamapande said.

Shamapande spoke of ways students cause costly damage.

"Every weekend there is $15,000-$50,000 in damage done to the dorms. Those benches lining the walkway to Whitmore. There's one knocked over everyday... It costs $60 every time they are put back up... Students are the one who pay for these damages," Shamapande said.

Since students are required to be at the first two classes of a course Shamapande would lengthen Whitmore's business hours to times when most students aren't in classes.

"A report was done that showed that 13,000 students were in class from 11 a.m.–4 p.m.. You don't go to class so you can pay a bill," Shamapande said.

Shamapande would also call for an inner review of the SGA to make it more efficient to do work for the students.

"[I] would call for an inner review of the SGA which would ultimately help students. Getting senators to go out and get 20 signatures [before proposing a motion]. This way we stay in contact with the students," Shamapande said.

With out–of state tuition rising Shamapande would work to keep tuition for all students low.

"[I would] make sure tuition and fees stay low. I've seen a lot of [promises on] fliers that would keep fees high. All the things we are proposing would not raise tuition and fees," Shamapande said.

Eleanor Court, a junior neurobiology major has been involved with the SGA since her freshman year, starting as treasurer of the Orchard Hill Area Government her freshman year, Governor as well as working with the Board of Trustees as Assistant Trustee. Now in her junior year Court is the student representative on the Board of Higher Education.

If elected to student trustee, Court's priorities will focus on the Course and Teacher Evaluation (CATE) guide, lowering education costs for students and getting credits for students involved in extra curricular activities.

The CATE guide is currently in collective bargaining to be approved. Court feels pressure needs to be kept on the administration through the bargaining process to keep it a high priority.

"Who knows how long collective bargaining is going to go? We need to keep pressure while bargaining is going on with the administration. We need to follow through," Court said.

Another issue Court plans to work on if elected is connecting Whitmore Administration Building offices into "one–stop–shopping" for students.

"Two years ago the administration hired an Administrative Redesign Director (ARD). An issue brought up was the inefficiency of Whitmore," Court said.

Court has a plan to make the administration more efficient.

"It would be more efficient to have one–stop–shopping, connecting Financial Aid, Bursars office and the Registrars office. A connection between them would be more user friendly. I haven't seen it this year. I want to follow through with what happened to it," Court said.

If elected student trustee, Court will work on a project to give credits to students involved in extra curricular activities.

"Students in co–curricular activities get credit. I think it should be expanded to include athletes and RSO leaders who are so committed. We're trying to get some recognition for RSO leaders and athletes," Court said.

Court agrees with the goal of 20 percent of students being Asian, Latino, African, Native Americans (ALANA) students if it represents the states population.

"It's absolutely essential our university population reflect our community. We're a public school and we should have equal access to all residents of the state," Court said.

On the issue of drinking on campus Court feels there needs to be stronger support services.

"My main concern is that support services are very lacking. They're not adequately funded or staffed," Court said.

■ Pellegrino

Research Group (MASSPIRG) all in the same office. I want to make that a big priority," Pellegrino said.

In addition to space allocation Pellegrino would create a programming board for RSOs.

"The program board selects times for RSOs to do programming and it would have a main schedule so there won't be RSO programming overlaps. It would help with advertising and really help the small RSOs. The small RSOs need help especially with breakthrough stuff," Pellegrino said.

Student businesses are also a priority to Pellegrino.

"Helping student businesses is definitely important. I want to put student businesses first. They add to the character of what makes UMass, UMass," Pellegrino said.

Campus safety is a major issue in Pellegrino's campaign.

"We did a safety walk with Women's Issues. A lot of lighting problems are trees [cutting back branches] can improve up to 60 percent. Some say the orange lights aren't bright enough but they give off light to a bigger area than the white lights. You really do need to have a background in this," Pellegrino said.

Another security issue for Pellegrino is 24–hour card access.

"24–hour card access, all it does is secure the administration from lawsuits and make parents feel better. A lot of school have a 24–hour person that is a bigger deterrent. It's [card access] a minor inconvenience. Anyone who wants to get into the building can. I did it when I went to get signatures for my nomination. People hold the door for you," Pellegrino said.

Pellegrino would like to improve relations between University Productions and Concerts (UPC) and the SGA.

"I would like to build connections between these two groups. UPC can't get back on their feet if they continue to have an antagonistic relationship with the SGA," Pellegrino said.

Jeffrey Howe, a sophomore political science and sociology major, has been part of the SGA for two years working as a senator.

He has also served on the Finance Committee and the Dining Services Committee. In addition, he has been an active member of House Council.

Howe, if elected as student trustee, plans to work on campus safety, keeping tuition and fees down and gaining more funding for the University.

Howe pointed out problems with campus security.

"Last year [there was a motion] to have more lighting and call boxes placed on the 'rape trail' but because the trail is not recognized by the University they won't put call boxes or lighting there... If call boxes are put there then the University is responsible for what goes on there. Some places that now have call boxes and lights are much more secure than that path," Howe said.

The "rape trail," is the path which connects Central and Orchard Hill Residential Areas to Sylvan Residential Area.

Howe believes if there aren't significant changes in the University then student fees should not be raised.

"A state education is intended to be a quality education at an affordable price. And unless there is some significant improvement that students can see then fees should stay the same or be lowered," Howe said.

The Board of Trustees would pay for deferred maintenance under Howe's plan to make it a high priority.

"[Funding for deferred maintenance] can only come from two places, the state or students' pockets. With the price so high nobody but the state could provide the funding," Howe said.

Howe feels there is a problem with recruiting ALANA students.

"Approximately 18,000 students apply, 16,000 are accepted but only 3,000–4,000 come here. The problem is not getting people to apply, the problem is convincing them to come to this school. We need an aggressive recruiting and retention program of ALANA students. I do think 20 percent is a good idea," Howe said.

Howe describes the most important responsibility of the Student Trustee is to advocate for students rights.

"[The student trustee's job] is to ensure student rights on campus and make sure students needs are not forgotten. Be an advocate for student rights and responsibilities to the state legislature and administration and ensure quality and affordable education that is practical and of use in the real world," Howe said.

Howe feels bunning alcohol will not stop drinking.

"Alcohol is a problem with any group of students. People under 21 are going to drink anyway. It's only making more work for the police," Howe said.

Goodell revisited: questions still remain

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Staff

The student takeover of the Goodell building was one of the most important events of the spring semester of 1997, but it has since faded into obscurity. Yet a handful of students continue to work with administrators to ensure the causes that students took over the Controller's Office in Goodell are not forgotten, despite the fact that such causes often are.

"What excites me about Goodell is, a year later, I tell the students about [our continued dealings with the university] administration and I'm surprised by their responding energy," graduate student and Goodell occupier Rodina Cave said.

Yesterday marked the first anniversary of the end of the Goodell building takeover. In the time since the takeover, students and faculty remain at odds, yet continue to work together.

The student occupiers left Goodell on March 8, 1997, after the University administration committed itself to meet 21 of their demands, collected to form a contract, called "The Living Document." Under the Living Document the University will increase minority enrollment in the graduate and undergraduate student bodies, reduce holds on registration due to outstanding bills, diversify University staff and curriculum, and convene a task force on child care.

While the administration is responsible for seeing their commitments are met, they have continued to meet with students. These meetings were for administrators to make clear to students how they would fulfill their comitments.

Which, the former occupiers said, they have not.

"The administration is unwilling to deal honestly with students," Graduate Voice editor Tom Taaffe said, "it's painful to deal with pathological liars."

The discussions themselves are the greatest source of confusion for the students working with the administration. They had been meeting on a regular basis until December.

The administration then told students Phase One of discussions — where the relevant administrators and student overseers met as complete groups — was over as of December. The administration declared discussions to be at Phase Two — where students meet individually with administrators relevant to their concerns.

"What the hell is Phase Two?," Taaffe said.

For one side to declare a phase of discussions complete indicates that there are no discussions at all, Taaffe said.

The students working with the administration are also upset about the way in which the administrators are meeting their demands.

The University's commitments include ensuring that 20 percent of all undergraduate and 15 percent of all graduates will be African, Latino, Asian and Native American (ALANA) students. To get this percentage in this years incoming classes, the university included students who did not indicate their race or ethnicity on their enrollment applications.

Director of Undergraduate Admissions Arlene Cash said this is because there are more ALANA students in the undeclared section than there are whites, because many ALANA students feel that to identify themselves could be detrimental in some way.

Another commitment the university made, to hire a United Asian Learning Resources Center (UALRC) counselor, also has gone unfulfilled thus far, even though some students overseeing the administration said there was a chance to fill it.

These students allege that Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Tom Robinson did not fill the $40,000 a year position, even though he had ample funds and was asked by Chancellor David K. Scott if he would fill the position.

Robinson responded that he had never had the opportunity to fill the position previously, and added he would be requesting funds for the position in his next budget proposal.

Regarding holds on class registration for financial reasons, the administration said they must keep them in many situations, but have eliminated them where they could.

That comes too late for junior art major Justin Beatty, who was given a $2,600 bill he could not pay, because the University did not file his student loan paperwork. As a result, he missed two years of school.

Beatty said the University policies toward minority and low–income families is rough on students, and added the school should change the way it deals with students.

"As far as the school has been concerned, [students] are just money, we keep them in business," Beatty said.

Several news stories and editorials appearing at the time of the takeover depicted it as only helping ALANA students. But many students involved do not agree this was the case.

"Goodell was not just an ALANA thing," UMass student Brad Davidson said. "Students of different cultures worked together to accomplish one common goal."

Clarkson presents faculty lecture

Exercise science professor speaks on human muscle system

By Aimee Wallis
Collegian Correspondent

Thursday afternoon marked the third lecture of the Distinguished Faculty Lecture Series featuring Professor Priscilla M. Clarkson of the exercise science department at the University of Massachusetts.

Clarkson presented a lecture titled "Muscle Soreness: The Aftermath of Overexertion" to an auditorium containing family, students and faculty. Following the lecture, Clarkson answered questions from the audience and received a medal of honor for her services here at UMass.

After receiving a masters degree in science/zoology, Clarkson decided to combine her love for dance and interest in the mechanics of the human body to obtain a doctorate degree in exercise science. Besides teaching and lecturing, Clarkson has co–authored a book on the kinesiology of dance. She is also presently on the press board of directors of ballet.

Clarkson has been an exercise science professor for over twenty years giving lectures all over the world. She teaches and aids a range of students from first year to graduates. Clarkson has been published in over 100 articles and has published two books of her own.

Clarkson's presentation focused on a brief introduction of the human muscle system followed by information as to why muscles get sore due to overexertion and what treatments work.

After muscles are overexerted, pain results when the muscles lengthen during exertion of force. This is called an eccentric movement. Strain on the muscle fibers cause the muscles to become over extended thus eccentric movements are the cause of muscle damage.

Clarkson explained that muscles get sore due to lactic acid (which is produced during high intensity exercise and causes a burning sensation which is quickly carried away from the muscle), spasms, connective tissue damage and muscle fiber damage.

Clarkson explained the reasons why muscles do not show signs of soreness until after 24 hours. It is not until almost a day after the pull on the muscle that the "clean–up crew" as Clarkson called it, removes damaged debris to the muscle and begins to rebuild. The highest peak of the sore muscle is at 48 hours due to the "clean–up crew."

Clarkson reviewed the bout effect which occurs when a subject lifts weights for an hour and the next day all of their muscles are torn and they cannot move. After the healing process takes place and without training with weights the subject lifts the same amount of weights weeks or even months later and feels great the next day. This change of reaction to the exercise is called the Bout Effect.

Though muscles are not permanently damaged after overexertion there is a worse case scenario called, Rhabdomyolysis. Rhabdomyolysis is when high blood MB levels spill over into the myoglobinuria (brown urine) causing kidney function to shut down. This can especially happen if a person is dehydrated (heat stress.)

She reviewed temporary ailments that will ease muscle soreness such as aspirin, massages and sports creams however Clarkson explained these will not help the muscle fibers to get better any faster or help to alleviate the pain all together, they are simply for temporary relief.

Clarkson finished the lecture by lending a few common sense tips. She suggested on starting a new exercise program gradually, train before performing strenuous exercise and drink plenty of fluids.

Howe said.

"I think student government is setting a bad example. Students feel disillusioned... I will try to smooth out the partisanship that's going on to make sure people work for students," Jennifer Casasanto, former presidential candidate said.

"No one [in the Senate] has malintent. But we need to realize that we're all here for the same reason. We need to stop walking out to break quorum," said Amy Pellegrino, presidential candidate.

"We can stop the fighting if the people in senate would represent their constituency. Have senators sponsor bills with signatures from their constituency. Outreach needs to happen," Salwe Shamapande, presidential candidate said.

While many candidates oppose the 24–hour card access pilot program that is currently being implemented in Southwest and Orchard Hill Residential Areas, some are hesitant to criticize the program before results are evaluated.

"I would rather see more student security at desks instead of scanners. The university is spending money on something that is useless," Casasanto said.

"We have to remember that it's a pilot program and see the results. If it stops an attack or a rape is it worth it? I think so," Jesse Burchfield said.

"We do need to be careful because it's a pilot program. I refuse to look at no data and say it's failed," Shamapande said.

The ALANA (Asian, Latino, African American and Native American students) Caucus was also discussed concerning a bill that was defeated early last semester seeking to dissolve the caucus because it allows students to be voting members of the senate without being elected into the office.

"I'm against the appointment of students to the senate. I would like ALANA to have ex–officio status. They wouldn't be able to vote, but they could bring motions before the senate," presidential candidate Phillip Blue said.

■ SGA

"This person [Justin Smith] has no right to slander me, or slander this campaign," Howe said.

"I am so disgusted that this has happened," Pellegrino said.

At 12:30 this morning, the election committee had developed Smith's negatives but could not print photographs or otherwise enlarge the negatives to decide if the men in question could be identified as Pellegrino and Howe campaign workers.

The two candidates waited over two hours for the photos to be developed. No results were available at the time of print.

"Stuff like this happens every year," Pellegrino said. "It's tough, there's so much at stake."

Parker and Hansen were named in a complaint filed by the Election Commission, claiming they were covering opponents' posters with their own.

The two did not appear at the hearing. Later saying they were never notified of it.

Chancellor of Elections Carlos Alvarez immediately asked for their names to be removed from the ballots and the motion was carried out.

"They can't just take me off the ballot," Parker said. "They're scared I'm going to win."

Hansen said he was never notified of the hearing. "I'd like to know how the SGA can take us off the ballot without telling us before hand," he said.

Alvarez said he asked Parker to be at the meeting at 9 p.m., and he expected him to appear.

Both Parker and Hansen deny the allegations that they removed or covered opponents' flyers. According to Hansen, he and Parker had no help with their campaign flyering.

"I know I didn't put any of our flyers over anyone else's and I didn't tear any down. Dan gave me his word that he didn't either," Hansen said.

15 minutes to walk from each building. The shuttle would be running every half hour. The Pioneer Valley Transit Authority (PVTA) is great but people don't know when it is. Parking tickets should go towards this shuttle service," Rozantes said.

In order to improve food quality Rozantes plans to work on a plan with the SGA.

"When I [meet with] senate we'll work on a plan. We can come up with a successful plan," Rozantes said.

Rozantes would also like to have the library and computer labs open 24–hours.

"People want this. People will volunteer to keep these hours. Maybe we could do it as a Teachers Assistant thing," Rozantes said.

"We already have labs it's just a matter of turning them into 24–hours," Rozantes said.

Low quality housing cable channels are a waste of money and are something Rozantes would like to change.

"We're paying housing for low quality things like this where we could use the same money to pay for high quality," Rozantes said.

Rozantes feels the current alcohol policy is adequate.

"I feel the current alcohol policy is adequate for young adults on campus... I am happy with the situation now," Rozantes said.

SGA election candidates have their say

A note from the editors

Today's Ed/Op page features pieces written by candidates in the Student Government Association (SGA) elections for Student Trustee and SGA President. The Collegian feels it is important to provide the candidates with this space so that students have some information about the stances of the candidates when they go to the ballot box.

The printing of these platform statements is in no way meant to imply Collegian support for one candidate or another. We have intentionally avoided headlines with editorial content, and have ordered the columns alphabetically by candidates' last names to present these pieces in the most neutral way possible.

Four candidates did not submit pieces for this page: Erik Hansen, Brian Tirrell, and Evan Rozantes who are running for Student Trustee; and Phillip Blue who is a candidate for SGA President.

Elections will be held today and tomorrow. We encourage you to inform yourself about the opinions of those running and then cast ballots for the candidates you feel would best represent the UMass student body.

Candidates for Trustee

Eleanor Court

My name is Elly Court and I am running for Student Trustee with Salwa Shamapande who is running for SGA President. Of all the Trustee candidates, I am the most experienced. Last year I served as Assistant Student Trustee and this year I am the student member of the Board of Higher Education. As Assistant Trustee, I actually met and collaborated with members of the UMass Board of Trustees, and on the Board of Higher Education I have worked with Trustees from 29 different campuses. I know the position and I have the confidence and maturity to be a strong advocate for students to the Board.

The difference between Salwa and I and the other candidates is that our platform is not made up of grandiose promises for which we have no plan of implementation. We will not promise HBO and ESPN because we understand it is not a feasible option. Our platform consists of issues and goals that we feel are most important and those we are confident that we can work on successfully.

One of our big issues is access to student evaluations. We are in support of making student evaluations of faculty accessible to students. We feel this will help provide students with the most information when registering for classes. Salwa has worked on this on campus and I have brought it to a statewide level this year. We are closer than ever to achieving our goal, and we want to finish this.

We also want to take on the issue of deferred maintenance. But we recognize that we cannot be successful as UMass– Amherst alone. We are prepared to mount a massive voter registration campaign that would unite the 29 campuses in our system. As a block of 175,000 students, we can lobby the State Legislature wielding our voting power as our sword. In this way we believe we can make the state take responsibility for its buildings. We also plan to lobby the Legislature to increase investment into public education, so as to keep tuition and fees low. As your next Trustee, I will work with the Board of Higher Education on this.

Salwa and I have a plan for all of our issues; if you are interested in results, please cast your vote for us.

Elly Court is a UMass student.

Brenda Fitzpatrick

Over the last two years, our campaign has focused around the slogan: "Tired of Being Treated Like a Number?" As a student at this University, I am tired of being treated like a number by the administration as well as the student government. Although this is a large university, it is not inevitable that students be treated like they are just part of the "masses."

In my years here at the University, I have been active in a wide range of activist organizations, such as Common Ground (an organization dedicated to bridging class divides) and The Committee for Human Rights and Democracy in Nigeria. In these organizations, we worked hard to make our members and the public-at-large feel included in what we were doing. I would like to bring this to student government.

Throughout our campaign, Jesse Burchfield and I have focused upon issues which we really believe can get accomplished and not just empty promises. For example, we want to create a pro–student Whitmore. We plan on accomplishing this goal in three ways.

We want to expand Whitmore's 1–800 help line throughout the entire year. So often, you try calling and you can't get through because it's busy. By extending the 1–800 number throughout the year, we hope that students can solve their problems over the phone instead of waiting in line.

Two, we want to create an early–warning notification system. If a problem arises with your account, you should be notified early enough so that you can solve your problem without going into a nervous breakdown. Also, you should be given the steps to solve the problem.

Third, we want to re–train the staff who work in the Bursar's Office, Financial Aid and Housing so that students receive the correct answer the first time.

As Student Trustee, I would serve as a voice to ensure that student issues are addressed and solved at the Board of Trustees. In addition, I would like to build a coalition between undergraduates, graduates, faculty and staff so that we may begin the process of reaching our common goals and alleviating our common frustrations.

Brenda Fitzpatrick is a UMass student.

Jeffrey Howe

Attention UMass students: You are not getting the representation that you deserve!!!! My name is Jeff Howe and I am running for the position of Trustee with presidential candidate Amy Pellegrino. I am a sophomore political science/sociology double major. For the past two years I have been a senator from Orchard Hill. The reason that I decided to run is that bureaucracy has destroyed our student representation. We, the students, no longer have a strong leader that will represent our needs to the administration.

If elected, I intend to set a foundation that will help our university prosper. I hold the fundamental belief that state universities should be affordable for all students and will oppose any fee or tuition increase. The groups that make our campus diverse, such as RSO's, need the space and funding to function freely and independently. Campus safety will be a priority, with the demand for more lighting and call boxes across campus. We must find a way to decrease the amount of deferred maintenance we have on campus, before our buildings become completely useless. On campus, we have the right to a spring concert. I guarantee that will be back next year, as a free and fun show for everyone. Any new alcohol policy will not include a ban of alcohol. We pay student activities fees for tickets, yet the Mullins Center restricts our usage to certain areas. That must change. We need to address the horrendous food situation. It isn't fair to pay $1,000 a semester and eat cheap food substitutes. We need to unlock the doors in Southwest and Orchard Hill and make certain this impractical plan does not get implemented campus wide. A campus of this size should have more than three ATM machines. We need to find a way to provide ATM's in more locations across campus.

These are just some of the major issues that I have an extreme interest in and will pursue as your Trustee. Now the decision is yours. Do UMass a favor and get out and vote. Make the choice that is right for students. Vote Jeff Howe for Trustee and Amy Pellegrino for President. Thank you.

Jeff Howe is a UMass student.

Eric Magazu

Why am I running for Student Trustee? I want to improve the quality of education and other services here at UMass.

Along with Phillip Blue, who is running for president, my goal is to make UMass a better place to attend. Let me tell you what I support and provide some more information:

- Stop any of the administration's attempts to insititute an alcohol ban
- Keep tuition and fees low, for both in-state and out-of-state students
- Support the diversity that makes UMass a great university
- Make the pre-registration process easier for all students, in any major
- Accelerate the process of renovating dorms and campus buildings
- Get paper towels or electric hand dryers in all dorm bathrooms
- Get Ethernet in all dorms to increase e-mail access
- Provide more access to students to choose what channels are on dorm cable: HBO, ESPN, MTV and others
- End the AT&T monopoly on campus; lower long distance rates
- Get better food, and a later closing time, in every Dining Commons
- More call boxes, better lighting, faster Escort Service
- Change the 24-hour card swipe back to nights only
- Get an ATM in Southwest, and eventually one near each Munchy Store
- Support all registered student organizations and student-run businesses

Any issue of yours is an issue of mine, but you have to tell me about it. You can contact Phil or me through our webpage, http://www-unix.oit.umass.edu/~emagazu/. We will always stay up-to-date with your issues. This includes my "Meet the SGA" initiative, which I hope will greatly increase involvement with the SGA. Don't hesitate to stop and talk to me in person, I will always be enthusiastic to get your input. I hope you will give me the opportunity to serve you as your Student Trustee.

Eric Magazu is a UMass student.

Candidates for President

Jesse Burchfield

Today and tomorrow, the students at this university will be asked to choose their president and trustee. To many students, these titles belong to an organization which has separated itself from the student body. The Student Government Association (SGA) has turned into a training ground for politicians and bureaucrats, instead of an opportunity to serve as a student voice.

My experience does not stem from politics, but from action. I have been blessed with the opportunity to work with organizations like the Sierra Club, Human Rights Campaign and United Farm Workers. When working with these groups, a goal was set and hard work and preparation led us towards that goal. It is this simple and often forgotten method that I would like to bring to student government.

I make only one promise. I promise to rise every morning and passionately pursue a better education and improved standards for the students of this University.

I would like to begin working on releasing sophomores from their obligation to join the meal plan. Students should have the choice of whether or not to spend approximately $1,000 a semester for a service they may no want.

In addition, the Registered Student Organizations (RSOs) on this campus rely on funding from the Student Government Association (SGA). Often the political process interferes with what is best for students. Unfortunately, friendships and petty political rivalries often determine the fate of many clubs and organizations. A non–political method of determining funding needs to be established where the activities put on by an organization and its membership determines funding.

This semester, Brenda Fitzpatrick and myself began working on the first comprehensive study for the need of undergraduate childcare. A study has not been done and Aid for Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) numbers are being used to project the need for childcare. We felt that these numbers were unreliable if we were going to begin solving the need for undergraduate childcare. No parent should be forced into choosing between a better future and their children.

These are just a few of the ideas we would like to pursue if elected. We are asking for your vote so we can have an opportunity to begin working on these projects. Both Brenda Fitzpatrick and I share the same goals and determination. We hope you share in our enthusiasm of what could be accomplished and our disdain for what has not.

Jesse D. Burchfield is a UMass student.

Jennifer Casasanto

My name is Jennifer Casasanto. I am a junior political science/history major. I live in Moore dormitory in Southwest. I have been in student government as a senator for three years and now I am running for president.

I am running to ensure that students have a strong voice in their government. I am the candidate with the most experience. I ran for senate in the beginning of my freshmen year and I have been re–elected twice in Southwest since then. I have served in many leadership positions within the senate, including chairperson of three separate committees. I have worked diligently to support student rights on this campus, including fighting the proposed surveillance cameras in our dorms, and helping to stop last year's policy of room sweeps during fire drills.

I am running on the issues that are real and that the students care about. Once elected, I will stop the pilot program of 24–hour lock down in the dorms. As an alternative, I want to see increased student security in the dorms, trained people who can react to trouble situations. I will lobby to get a new bid for towing on campus. Amherst Towing is ripping students off and we can get a lower bid.

I will also continue to fight to keep UMass affordable through tuition cuts and prevention of fee increases. We also need to reform the sports ticket distribution system so that there are more student seats and we are able to sit with our friends.

Finally, student government needs to increase funding for Spring Concert to ensure that it is not cancelled again. These are the issues that are my priorities once elected. I have worked on student issues for three years and I ask that you elect me your next student government president so I can continue. Thank You.

Jennifer Casasanto is a UMass student.

Daniel Parker

In the past and in the present there are thousands of students that always have a problem with the way UMass runs. Current issues such as the Office of Information Technology (OIT), Housing, the Dining Commons and administration in general, have seem to upset every student on campus in one form of another.

I, Dan Parker, am really fed up with this, along with every other student. The Student Government Association (SGA) seems to have failed in their task of trying to represent the majority of student needs. I don't have a background or any kind of history in SGA, but I know what it takes to get the student voices heard to every other student, and most importantly, to Whitmore.

Dan Parker is a UMass student

Amy Pellegrino

If we sit back thirty years from now to reflect on our college days, chances are, we aren't going to think about locked doors and whether or not we had an ATM at the dining commons. True, the ending of 24–hour card access and regional ATM's are plans I would like to see come into fruition, but it's only a fraction of a larger picture. Programming your student organization put on, or a great spring concert, the professor that made such an impact, or seeing the basketball team come back next year to beat the University of Rhode Island by twenty at the Mullins Center, are memories that stay long after graduation. These causes are worthy of being put on a pedestal to be called priorities.

The Student Government Association (SGA) should be about building bridges, not burning them. Good communication is paramount. Helping to solve problems at University Productions & Concerts (UPC) is one example where this communication needs to take place. One of my goals is to help build this organization back into the powerhouse it was years ago.

Advocating for registered student organizations (RSOs) and student business space in the University Center 2000 is another priority. Student businesses are valuable entities worth protecting, as they add to the unique character of the University. RSOs historically have had a difficult time in scheduling space for meetings, and it is my sincere hope that the UC 2000 project will take this into account, as I will advocate for it tirelessly until it becomes a reality.

In the area of academics, I would like to see a stronger advising program, a measure that will hopefully increase the rate of retention at the University. By working with the Faculty Senate, progress can be made in this area. Deferred maintenance is a priority. When I went on the tour of UMass as a prospective freshmen, for some reason we skipped looking at Bartlett 65. However, I do not want the money to come from leaving open positions caused by a professor's retirement. As one Collegian writer said, "There is no use in having renovated classrooms if there is no one at the front teaching."

I hope you will agree with some of the positions I have outlined and take the time to vote on Monday and Tuesday. Thank you for your support.

Amy Pellegrino is a UMass student.

Salwa Shamapande

My name is Salwa Shamapande and I am a second year computer systems engineering student. My running mate is Elly Court, who is running for Student Trustee.

Planning for success is our campaign slogan, because it fits with our vision for the Student Government Association (SGA). Elly and myself have spent the last year on our premiere issue, CATE (Course and Teacher Evaluation) Guide.

CATE is an evaluation form that would be filled out at the end of the semester. Students are now not able to see these evaluations, but we want to make them open for all students. In order to save cost and make it more accessible, we would post it on the Internet.

Our second big issue is that of deferred maintenance, commonly known as "fixing what is broken." This institution has run up a bill of $393 million. Places like Boyden Gymnasium, Goessman Laboratory and the Student Union have contributed to this cost. How do we bring down the cost without increasing student tuition and fees? We must pressure the Legislature to take care of their buildings. We are already taxed for these costs. To tax us again in the form of raising fees or tuition is unacceptable. We have come up with a two tier strategy to combat this problem.

I will campaign on campus for voter registration. The only way to get the Legislature to listen is to say, "Fix our facilities or we will find someone who will."

The second tier is Elly's. After students are organized on a campus level, we need to organize them on a statewide level (Lowell, Boston, Worcester, Dartmouth and Amherst).

The problem with deferred maintenance also speaks on a much deeper level, asking: Where are the priorities of our elders? They must ensure the future of public colleges, beginning with facilities.

The third issue we will be taking on is that of Whitmore. Specifically, making sure the Bursar's, Financial Aid, and Housing offices are open later for students. Elly Court will be working on the idea of "One–Stop Shopping." This is an office that has all three in one. It will stop students getting thrown from office to office syndrome.

Planning for success pushes us to look at the bigger issues that require planning. Salwa Shamapande and Elly Court have done just that. We have the experience and the plan to do what students need done. Others have made promises that frankly cannot be kept. We can keep our promises because we have planned to do so, and that is the difference in candidates.

Ed/Op is looking for new writers!

The Ed/Op desk is currently seeking new columnists. The way to get involved is by submitting pieces for us to consider publishing. They should be 600–800 words long, well–written, and have a point. There are no restrictions on topics, but we are especially interested in pieces on campus politics, satire, and work that takes an unexpected perspective.

Editorials can be submitted by emailing letters@oitvms.oit.umass.edu or in person to the Collegian offices in the Campus Center basement. Call Tamar Carroll

Black Affairs

Monday, March 9, 1998

Letter from the editor

I would like to formally introduce myself to all of our readers. My name is Edgar A. Barros and I am the new Black Affairs Page editor.

Nice to meet you!

My plans for the Black Affairs page are simple. I want to continue to provide a forum where the words, thoughts, ideas, theories, and knowledge of all our black students can be heard. The words spoken on this page will enlighten our community on some of the news and controversies affecting this campus, this country and this planet. There are many issues today which affect black people which need to be discussed. These issues have to be made public.

Those of us who know, those of us who possess knowledge and those of us who care need to educate each other. Those of you who claim to "know" need to come forth and enlighten the masses. There are many students on this campus who waste their lives away by sleeping or by partying for semesters on out. Others are so buried in their book, they don't realize that the world which awaits them is not all about accounting, engineering or biology. Our world today is not a happy place.

We, as a people, must equip ourselves with the knowledge (remember: knowledge is power) needed to survive in this racist, oppressive world. The Black Affairs Page is a place where we can acquire some of this knowledge.

The Black Affairs Page is not here to preach hate towards white people. That is not its purpose. The Black Affairs Page is simply a bulletin board designated with the responsibility to post "knowledge." As each reader picks up the paper and reads the Black Affairs Page, knowledge is passed, people our educated and many themselves become inspired to write (post knowledge) — thus the cycle of knowledge continues.

Reflect on what Malcolm X said, "The greatest weapon of the oppressor, is the minds of the oppressed." Read that quote once more and think about what it means. For those of you who believe that we are living in a world of equality, justice and democracy, you are a lending yourself over to the oppressor as a weapon against the oppressed! Yes, the physical chains and shackles have been broken. Yes, we are able to eat at the same lunch counter as white people and attend the same schools. Yes, the African nations are now free of physical occupation by European nations, but WE ARE NOT DONE YET!

The ropes are still around our necks. We are still the targets of racist laws, racist economic practices and we are still the victims of secret missions designed at turning many of our African governments against each other which seriously handicaps the possibility of Pan–Africanism.

Therefore, in closing this brief letter, I ask that all those who know come down and help spread the knowledge.

Edgar A. Barros is a Collegian staff member.

The real on the SGA elections

Humphrey brown III

I love HBO. I really do.

They show all the box office hits, have great original movies, good boxing and get the best comedians to do their hour comedy specials. Not to take anything away from our own channel 7, but if it were up to me, we'd all be spittin' up Kool–Aid as we watch the ghetto–fabulous funny men and women of "Russel Simmons' Def Comedy Jam." Ya'll know you still watch it.

Unfortunately, nobody's watching "Def Jam" if they live on campus, because we don't get HBO in the dorms. We've never gotten HBO in the dorms. And, no matter how badly we all want it, we'll never get HBO in the dorms.

I know what you're thinking. I know what you're all thinking.

"If I vote for so–and–so in the SGA elections, today, we'll get HBO."

Wrong.

There is no name on that ballot today, that can give you HBO, ESPN, MTV or any other of the cable channels you've been promised.

Why? Nobody can get those channels for you, because if they did, it would be the only channel you'd be watching. The cost of getting those channels is more than this University is willing to spend.

The same goes for better food in the D.C. If we want that, we have to privatize. We've been down that road before and nobody wanted it. Everyone knows It's not good for student run and operated establishments like People's Market. Yet I still continue to see all these flyers from candidates claiming to be able to get these things.

I really don't want to believe that anyone would waste their vote on issues like HBO in the dorms or better food in the D.C. With all of the really important issues, directly affecting the future of this University, that your elected president and trustee will deal with (i.e. child care, academic programs, $393 million in deferred maintenance) please tell me that you're not going to vote for someone who claims to be able to give you MTV.

In the two and a half years that I've been here, every campaign promises the same thing. If you see flyers for candidates that all center around the same trivial, petty issues, it ain't your imagination.

It seems nobody, save for Salwa Shamapande (president) and Elleanor "Elly" Court (trustee) knows anything about what's going on and really matters in this election. And why shouldn't they? They have the most experience.

Shamapande was on the negotiating team in last year's Goddell takeover. I remember because I was there. He was a freshman last year, but I didn't find that out until well after the takeover had ended. While in Goodell — tired and ready to leave — I watched Shamapande go toe–to–toe with the administration like he had been at UMass for years. Needless to say, I was impressed. Enduring six days of bureaucratic pooh–pooh (you know what I mean) from the administration is no easy task; particularly one as misleading and anti–negotiable as ours. Just ask GEO.

For the past year, he's been working with the Faculty Senate and virtually all the Vice Chancellors. He knows how and where to go to get things done. A lot of the other candidates simply don't have this kind of experience. It's one thing to know what needs to be done and be looking for the right people to talk to. It's another thing to know what needs to be done and already know where to find those people. Court is the same way.

She was treasurer and governor of the Orchard Hill Area Government her sophomore year. She's been an assistant trustee with trustee Carter, working closely and learning the ins and outs of what being a trustee is all about.

This year she served as the student on the board of higher education, representing all 29 campuses of public higher education in Massachusetts. While there, she worked with all 29 trustees and presidents from the other campuses and with the State Legislature of higher education.

Is that sick or what? It almost doesn't seem right. There are candidates who actually know what's going on, with the experience to make significant change.

Don't get me wrong. I'm sure the other candidates have a fairly good idea of what's going on too, but if they did, you'd think they wouldn't try and play the students like idiots by dancing around what's important and focusing on the real issues.

I love HBO and I would love an ATM In Southwest, but its not going to be the president or trustee that's gives those things to me. When I vote today, I'm voting for the cats I know are going to really do something for students. Not for someone who promises cable, but can only deliver snow.

Along the color line:
A black radical congress, part one

This June 19th, African–American activists from all over the country will be gathering in Chicago. The purpose of the gathering is to revive and to rebuild the spirit of black militancy and social justice within our community. This meeting which calls itself the "Black Radical Congress" has already been endorsed by hundreds of prominent black leaders, trade leaders, trade unionist, feminists, intellectuals and community activists.

A brief list of endorsers include: author Amiri Baraka; activist/scholar Angela Y. Davis; Bill Fletcher, education secretary; AFL–CIO attorney Lennox Hines; historian Gerald Horne; Gerry Hudson, vice president of Local 1199; Health and Human Services Union; Charlene Mitchell, co–chair, Committees of Correspondence; noted journalist Salim Muwakkil; anthropologist Leith Mullings; feminist scholar Barbara Ransby; Jamala Rogers, Organization for Black Struggle, St. Louis; Jerome Scott, director of Project South, Atlanta; feminist writer Barbara Smith; Los Angeles political activist Anthony Thigpen; Jarvis Tyner, vice chair, Communist Party USA; and noted African–American scholar Cornel West.

Dr. Manning Marable

The Black Radical Congress campaign was announced at a time of grave challenges which confront the African– American community. In the official statement calling for the Congress, the endorsers declared: "Black people face a deep crisis. Finding a way out of this mess requires new thinking, new vision, and a new spirit of resistance. We need a new movement of Black Radicalism. We know that America's capitalist economy has completely failed us. Every day more of us are unemployed and imprisoned, homeless and hungry. Police brutality, violence and the international drug trade threaten our children with the greatest dangers since slavery. The politicians build prisons but cut budgets for public schools, day care and health care. They slash welfare yet hire more cops. The government says working people must pay more taxes and receive fewer services, while the rich and the corporations grow fat. Black people and other oppressed people have the power to change the way things are today. But first we must unite against the real enemy."

For many younger African–Americans who did not live through the militant struggles of the 1960s and 1970s, there may be some uncertainty about the meaning of black radicalism. What does it mean to call oneself a "black radical" in the context of a racist, corporate–controlled society? How does black radicalism differ from any other political idealogy or program currently being pursued by other black organizations, such as the NAACP or the Nation of Islam? Perhaps an even deeper and more significant question which some may ask, is whether black folk have the willingness or capacity to effectively challenge the institutions of inequality and white supremacy which still largely define the character of American society?

There is a long and rich tradition of African–American radicalism in the United States. The African–American social protest tradition has historically called for a fundamental transformation of U.S. political economy and society, and the destruction of institutional racism and human oppression in all its forms.

There have been a series of brilliant and uncompromising African–American women and men who have personified the politics of black radicalism. One might begin with Henry Highland Garnet, the militant abolitionist who in 1843 called for the violent overthrow of slavery in the South. Garnet exhorted other African–Americans: "Let your motto be resistance!"

During the Civil War years, black radicalism was represented by the abolitionist writings and orations of Frederick Douglass, Sojourner Truth and the early feminist activist and poet, Frances Ellen Watkins Harper. In the summer of 1854, black militants led by abolitionist Martin R. Delaney held a black nationalist conference in Cleveland, Ohio, which in many ways foreshadowed the emergence of black power more than a century later.

In the late nineteen century, as hundreds of black people were lynched across the South, and losing their right to vote, the protest tradition of black radicalism emerged yet again. Anna Julia Cooper's 1892 book, A Voice from the South, represented perhaps the first important text of what would become known years later as black feminism. Crusading journalist Ida B. Wells used her skills as a writer to expose the massive crimes of lynching. William Monroe Trotter's protest publication, Boston Guardian, challenged the conservative accomodationism of educator Booker T. Washington. Trotter and the celebrated black scholar, W.E.B. Du Bois, founded the Niagara Movement in 1905, which later contributed to the establishment of the NAACP.

With the outbreak of World War I, black radicalism again erupted, not only in the U.S., but across the black diaspora. In South Africa, the African National Congress was launched. In the US, trade unionist A. Philip Randolph established a journal, The Messenger, which called for program of socialism and full equality for black Americans. Caribbean activist Cyril V. Briggs created the African Blood Brotherhood in the 1920, which advocated black revolution throughout the world. During the Great Depression, the Communist Party attracted thousands of black members and supporters by organizing rent strikes, farm and industrial workers. These and many other examples of black militancy illustrate the rich history of struggle within the African–Americans community. The Black Radical Congress in Chicago is only the most recent example of African– American protest thought.

The here and now

As winter finally winds down, the prospect of spring is a wonderful foreshadowing of longer days, first flower in bloom, and mental mind sets begin to improve.

The other day, while leafing through the pages of my journal, my thoughts for my new years resolutions leapt off the page at me, catapulting my mind into a mad frenzy. Promises of brilliant and hopeful changes for my future abounded. I will write this story, I will tell that story, I will tone this, I will be nicer when, more grateful when and so on and so forth the list continued. As I pondered over what I was actually doing it just seemed natural that this is what almost everyone does at the beginning of a new year, more so on the threshold of a new millennium.

"We must retrain ourselves to be fully present wherever we are, so that we can enjoy, rather than avoid, living each precious moment."

Millicent Jackson

My grandmother once said to me the problem with my generation is that we are constantly living for what lies ahead, wishing our life away. Tomorrow I will do this, next week I will do that, in two months I will be this, five years from now I will be that. For the first time since I began keeping a journal of my resolutions, I decided to reevaluate them in terms of what I am doing now. As what usually happens in my quiet time, the truth I was seeking was revealed.

So much of my energy was being focused on the future. I'm usually ahead of myself, my mind moving faster than my capacity to think. I'm forever thinking about what's next. So often I'm focused on the completion of a task, I often end up missing the delight of achieving it. I have to constantly remind myself that the moment I am living in now is the most important. I am guilty of saying that when I graduate my life will be more complete, when I make more money I will be happier, I will be content once I know my career is established. I'll be more patient, grateful, more understanding. When I am in school most of my focus is on graduating rather than on enjoying the process.

What I forgot is that joy is in the doing, expanding my awareness and putting what I want into action. The thrill of completion, of reaching my destination is fleeting. I have come to learn the real thrill is being on the journey. We must retrain ourselves to be fully present wherever we are, so that we can enjoy, rather than avoid, living each precious moment. We didn't come into this world in a hurry, or nervous. As small children we are complete individuals. We held the belief that wherever we were was the center of the universe and we were right. All of our insecurities were learned on our way to adulthood. Environmental training limits our ability to accept ourselves fully and enjoy our in the moment experiences. Unlearning these behaviors requires courage and commitment.

Life is a challenge. Things are bound to happen, good or bad. If we are constantly living our life looking to the past or the future we are racing ahead of ourselves instead of living in the here and now. Life is all about creating, changing, healing and giving birth to our new self. When we live in the here and now we see that people and situations are drawn to us in order to help us to grow and know our deepest truth. When we are fully aware, we don't race past the here and now in fear of it's outcome. We know every situation is an opportunity to grow. Every encounter is an experience of growth.

Now as I go from day to day, in the forefront of my mind is where the power lies. The future will be. None of us can rush or delay it, we can only create it by how we live and experience the present.

New anthology of Jewish writers to be published

By Bryan Schwartzman
Collegian Staff

Any one who has ever taken an English class is probably familiar with Norton Anthologies, the most widely used textbook in college classrooms. After the success of ethnically-based projects such as the Anthology of African– American Literature, the company has commissioned an Anthology of Jewish–American Literature.

University of Massachusetts professor emeritus Jules Chametzky is one of four co–editors working on the anthology which is expected to be available in 1999.

Chametzky said the anthology will chronicle Jewish– American experience from the colonial era through present day.

"This will establish to some extent what works of Jewish– American literature will become part of the canon," Chametzky said.

"It's a great honor, and yet also a great responsibility to be involved," Chametzky said.

He said there have been other anthologies, but this one will have three distinctions: there will be more women, more works translated from Yiddish, and popular song lyrics featuring artists such as Irving Berlin and Bob Dylan.

Chametzky is writing the general introduction and editing the section of literature from the end of the 19th century through the early part of the 20th.

A faculty member since 1958, he retired from full time teaching in 1992. Since then he has spent several semesters teaching in Europe.

In 1959 he was one of the founders of The Massachusetts Review, a progressive literature journal edited at the University. Since his retirement he has continued his work with the journal.

For Norton, the anthology business is quite lucrative for the company. The African–American anthology sold 30,000 copies in it's first six months he said. An anthology always raises questions of what is being left out. Not only is space a major concern, but Chametzky said certain things are just two expensive too include, such as a play by Arthur Miller.

"We were looking for themes that represent American life, Israel, the Holocaust, the second World War," he said.

There will also be works that are less explicitly concerned with Jewish themes.

"Jews have to be conscious of themselves as a minority. This is the best country Jews have ever lived in, but we still live with [the impact] of the Holocaust," he said.

Professor James Young of the English and Judaic Studies department said he think It will be an important work and the editors working on the story are some of the most knowledgeable in the field.

Lisa Loeb, the Jewish Campus Service Core Fellow hopes to study Jewish American literature in graduate.

"I hope no class or study will be limited to one anthology as it represents only a piece of the wide variety of literature as was chosen by a few editors and professors," she said.

Chametzsky said he prefers using full texts to anthologies in his classes.

on the dorms. Have security from 6 p.m.–2 a.m. with security working in two shifts of four hours," Blue said.

Student involvement in selecting cable channels is also on Blue's agenda if elected.

"I would like to get more student involvement in the selection of cable channels. We could put in ESPN for the same price and hopefully MTV too," Blue said.

Blue would also like to expand the escort service.

"The escort service van would be able to be there within five minutes of the time you call, not within half an hour of the time you call. I would also like to establish more student escorts for walking," Blue said.

As a BDIC major Blue would like to work to ease the registration for students with undeclared majors.

"I would like to make it easier for registration for students who have an undeclared major or BDIC majors," Blue said.

To implement these initiatives Blue does not feel going through SGA would be effective.

"I would prefer not working directly through the SGA. I know this might seem counter productive but I think the best idea is to approach the administration on a one to one basis," Blue said.

Blue feels there should be a greater awareness of the dangers of alcohol.

"There should be awareness that alcohol is not a solution to problems. It creates problems," Blue said.

Banning alcohol will only make drinking related injuries worse Blue said.

"An alcohol ban would cause more people to drink off campus... The further off campus you have to go, the further you have to get back.... It's just going to cause more alcohol related deaths," Blue said.

Blue would use influence to ensure a spring concert.

"I would use any type of influence to make sure the Ways and Means Committee allocates money for a Spring Concert," Blue said.

Freshman computer science major Eric Magazu has been involved in SGA since arriving on campus last September.

Magazu became a senator for the SGA last semester and served on the Ways and Means committee during that time.

He will be working to keep tuition and fees low, supporting policies to not have a alcohol ban and extending hours in the dining commons, if elected student trustee.

To lower fees Magazu plans to get more funding to the UMass.

"I will seek out legislature to increase allocation to UMass and get them to pay for more things they should be paying for. If a budget didn't help students I wouldn't vote for it, even if I was the only vote against the budget," Magazu said.

To lengthen the hours of the dining commons, Magazu would include it in contract negotiations.

"[It would be] going to the university as one of higher priorities for negotiation. I would lengthen the hours to after 7 p.m. I would try to propose getting more students involved to work after classes."

Adding an ATM in Southwest is possible with renovations to Hampden Dining Common Magazu said.

"I plan to get money to renovate Hampden which is one of the requirements before an ATM goes in. If Hampden could be expanded it would really help students. It's only a matter of getting a bank that won't charge any fees. I think it would be a quick process after that." Magazu said.

Magazu feels education is key to controlling drinking on campus.

"The way which it should be handled is education. It should be the primary method of trying to keep it under control. If we had it banned it would only push it off campus and people would be drinking and driving and that is not very safe... the program should be more oriented toward education not abstination," Magazu said.

Magazu also supports the university's goal of having 20 percent of the student population comprised of ALANA students.

"It is a noble goal. One of my feelings is that it's best to be color blind. The color of someone's skin should not impact whether you get in. Until everyone is judged based solely on an application we need this goal," Magazu said.

On ensuring spring concert Magazu said more funding is needed from the Student Activities Trust Fund (SATF).

"What we could do it look into how we can increase the SATF fund, work on getting more money into SATF without increasing the student activities fund," Magazu said.

Hadley Farm hosts 1st Equine Conference

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The Department of Veterinary and Animal Science hosted the first annual Equine Conference Sunday morning at the Hadley Farm Equine Center.

Events included a wet lab and demonstration of mare teasing, semen collection, ultrasound examination of the mare, and stallion handling.

"We're very pleased that for the first time we're able to offer seminars on equine management and veterinary," Douglas Freeman, director of the equine studies program at University of Massachusetts said.

Koyla Renaas, lecturer in equine management added, "Our goal is to teach and then to outreach to the community and inform them on what equine studies is all about."

The first demonstration consisted of mare teasing. A mare (female) is teased when a stallion (male) shows signs of arousal and the mare, sensing the arousal, becomes in heat.

However, in some instances, the mare will not always show signs of heat, which could imply that the mare is not satisfied with her mate or that the stallion is just fooling around with her and becomes very wild. Freeman emphasized the importance of handling the horse to keep it under control in such moments.

When the mare shows heat, her ovulation period begins. Upon breeding the horses, a mare should be in heat for three days so that the egg completes the ovulation cycle and becomes ready to receive the sperm.

Also, the preferred season of breeding for many types of horses is in the summer, when the days are longer, because the horses react to long daylight by releasing a hormone that causes stimulation of the ovula.

Horse breeders, however, prefer to breed during the winter, when daylight is shorter, so that the horses can develop into a strong breed at a young age. Owners such as Freeman place the mares under light for long periods of the day and this allows the mares to begin their ovulation cycle.

An ultrasound examination followed the teasing in which Freeman displayed the horses ovaries. "By examining the ovaries, we can determine the growth and development of the ovaries," Freeman said.

"By keeping exact records on the changes in the uterus and ovaries, we can use it to monitor the reproductive cycles of the mare," Renaas said.

Finally, the demonstrators performed a semen collection of the stallion.

Renaas said, "We try to keep an equal balance of riding, management and research; all of which are used for teaching purposes."

The Department of Veterinary and Animal Sciences hopes to continue the equine conference to further encourage students and other individuals to get involved in equine studies. Information on the department can be obtained by calling 259-1392.

used last summer except make it available all year long," Burchfield said.

"Secondly, I want to have a re–training of the staff in these offices. So when you get an answer it's the correct answer the first time," Burchfield said.

"Thirdly, we would implement an early warning system. When a problem comes up with your account you will be notified about it right away. 'Now they call you on Friday and say there's a problem with your account you need to be out of the dorms on Monday," Burchfield said.

Another major issue Burchfield would work on if elected is the CATE guide.

"Really there is not that much further to go on the CATE guide... we need to lobby with the Faculty Senate to make sure it gets on the table," Burchfield said.

Targeting SGA inefficiency, Burchfield plans to bring together it's different political groups to improve the work the SGA does for the students.

"It's turned into conservatives versus liberals which is odd because I don't see what being conservative or liberal has to do with the Bursar's office or the Dining Commons and what's getting accomplished," Burchfield said.

"I have brought conservatives to come work with me and liberals to come work with me in a coalition. Everything I have spoken before the senate has passed because I was able to build a coalition," Burchfield said.

The University goal of having ALANA students comprising 20 percent of the student body hits home with Burchfield.

"I am one of the individuals who has benefitted from this. My high school wasn't a place for studying. It was a place where you wondered how you were going to get home safely. [Without goals like] this we run the risk of denying that opportunity. There is someone out there dying to get an opportunity, we are running a risk of closing the door... It's a fantastic goal but they need to stop fudging the numbers by including "other" as ALANA students," Burchfield said.

Brenda Fitzpatrick, a fourth year student in a five–year program, majoring in Plant and Soil and Anthrropology got involved in government through activism in Common Ground Bridging, the class divide and a five college organization, and the Committee for Human Rights and Democracy in Nicaragua.

She also served as the political chairperson for the Pride Alliance. Fitzpatrick has been a senator in the Student Government Association(SGA) this year.

One of the biggest issues Fitzpatrick would address if elected is child care.

"The biggest issue I have is childcare and a need for more undergraduate childcare... Currently there are only 24 spots for undergraduates where there are over 16,000 students," Fitzpatrick said.

To help undergraduates who need childcare, Fitzpatrick would first work to find out how many need childcare.

"I worked on a task to study undergraduate need for childcare. It got passed [by the SGA]. The study should be completed by the end of the semester. [I want] to have firm numbers to give to the administration about childcare because all they were using was the AFDC," Fitzpatrick said.

Another issue Fitzpatrick would work to lower the cost of the meal plan.

"Right now Dining Services is part of Auxiliary Services and dining services is making a profit. Also part of Auxiliary services are things like the Hatch which loses money everyday. Dining Services is subsidizing businesses like the Hatch. We believe if a business is losing money it should look within itself and restructure management. Students shouldn't pay for mismanagement of other businesses," Fitzpatrick said.

Fitzpatrick feels the key to turning these issues into action if elected lie in uniting the SGA.

"I think to implement [issues] a coalition would make the SGA a place where action can be taken. We need to tear down the false walls we put up of conservative or liberal," Fitzpatrick said.

Fitzpatrick supports the goal of having 20 percent ALANA students comprise the population.

"I firmly support it. I think this again is speaking to graduate and undergraduate students," Fitzpatrick said.

Fitzpatrick would work for alternative programs to alcohol.

Encourage students to have programs and activities not based on alcohol so alcohol does not become the main function of students," Fitzpatrick said.

Lebowski knocks 'em down

COURTESY MERRICK MORTON

Jeff Bridges, John Goodman, and Steve Buscemi make for a dim–witted bowling team in the Coens' Big Lebowski.

By Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

THE BIG LEBOWSKI
Directed by Joel Coen
with Jeff Bridges, John Goodman, Julianne Moore
Playing at Hampshire Six Theaters

The Big Lebowski is not a bowling movie, although it contains some of the funniest bowling scenes in recent memory. And it's not a crime movie, although its plot sometimes mimics classic Hollywood film noir.

Actually, The Big Lebowski isn't really about anything at all — except its characters: a lazy ex–surfer who calls himself "The Dude," a fiery Vietnam veteran who draws his gun over a bowling score, an ultra–feminist artist who hurls herself across the room in a harness, a rival bowler named Jesus Quintana who dresses in all purple. Most of the humor in the film is based on such character idiosyncrasies and playful irony.

Ever since 1985's Blood Simple, the writing–directing team of Joel and Ethan Coen have put a twist on movie–making that culminated with 1996's Fargo, a stunning and hysterical look at small–town murder and mystery that won a slew of critical praise.

The Big Lebowski is a zanier film, a movie that strives for less polish and more anything–goes comedy, and succeeds, for the most part, in strides. It's as strange as its title, a movie with ridiculously trippy dream sequences involving Saddam Hussein and flying bowling pins.

The Coens love odd people, and perhaps their greatest asset is their ability to not only create strange characters, but strange characters with varying degrees of intelligence.

In their newest film, for instance, Jeff Bridges is Jeff Lebowski, a shaggy haired, perpetually stoned bum who redefines living casually and insists on calling himself "The Dude." When we first meet The Dude, two thugs are breaking into his apartment and urinating on his rug. Lebowski is mad because "the rug really tied the room together."

But the two thugs had the wrong guy — there's two Lebowski's in this California town, and the other one is an old millionaire with a sex–loving trophy wife named Bunny. When The Dude asks the other Lebowski to compensate for his rug, the millionaire enlists him in as a liaison to recapture the recently kidnapped Bunny.

Of course, the ransom exchange doesn't go as planned, and by the end of the film, German nihilists, a

Secret revealed on General Hospital

Hi soap fans, I hope everyone had a lovely weekend, like moi. Did anyone happen to catch last Thursday's AP article (Collegian, March 5) about the infamous Luke and Laura on "General Hospital" and the secret that is bound to nip Luke in the rear. In case you missed last Friday's episode (gasp, how could you?), Nik told Lucky that it was indeed Luke who had raped their mother all those years ago and not Mikos. Expect this reveal to lead to a huge Cassadine–Spencer feud (what's new?) with Liz right in the thick of things.

I have some conflicting feelings about the storyline although I have to admit, Bob Guza's got some "bleep," opening this can of worms (especially with all those die hard L&L fans). It's not exactly the most flattering picture of one of daytime's most legendary couples: man rapes girl, girl eventually falls in love with him. The entire concept was, and still is, disturbing which is why the show felt the need to do some damage control (rewriting the scene as a "seduction") before the two of them tied the knot. Daytime had a boo–boo on it's hand and like those of the past, "GH" would have been wise to have left it in the past (Robin's buddy, Casey), especially since most fans had all but forgotten about it (among those who witnessed it at all). Now I'm left with this icky feeling about my fave couple. I have to admit though, it makes for some intense drama (finally giving Anthony Geary a storyline worthy of his talent..."Emmy can you hear me?")

On the "Days of Our Lives," front... what is going on with the "Killing Pool?" (Kristin's death). What a wacky mystery this is turning out to be, eh? I absolutely love it. In case you missed last week's episodes, it was revealed that "Susan" is, in fact, Kristin in disguise (Kristin is alive and kicking), which means that it must have been Susan's body that they found in the pool, right? Not quite. On Thursday's episode we found out that Susan was being held hostage by one of Kristin's goons (bag tied around her head and all) which leaves... Sister Moria? Nope, word is she'll be making an appearance at Kristin's funeral this week which leaves us with the nagging question, who died in the pool? I have two guesses (neither one is beyond the realm of possibilities). I mean, this is "Days"), it's either Victor in drag or Thomas had a sex change and... no, I'm joking. While we're on the subject of "Days," country music sensation and longtime "Days" fan, LeAnn Rimes has agreed to a short stint on the show.

The details are a bit sketchy but the rumor is that her character (she's not playing herself) will be involved with Eric on some level. God help us all.

Now , for some news... mark your calendars for Tuesday night. In celebration of its 35th (don't quote me on that) anniversary, daytime's reigning queen, the "Young and the Restless," is airing a primetime special this Tuesday night (check your listings). If it's anything like last year's special, you "Y&R" fans (all two of you... you know who you are) won't want to miss it. Expect some fireworks between Dru and Neil as well as Grace (hasn't she become quite the Queen "B") and Sharon. You know it's only a matter of time before Neil and Olivia's one night stand is revealed and something tells me it may be sooner than later, especially in light of the fact that Dru is leaving Genoa City shortly. Look for Diane and Nikki's feud to come to a head as well, with explosive results.

"GH" has also announced plans for a primetime special, set to air on April 2 opposite "ER" (the phrase "glutton for punishment" comes to mind). The show won't be an actual episode like last year's "Twist of Fate" but a retrospective of the show's long history. They'll be interviews with former and current cast members (yes... Maurice, a.k.a. Sonny, will be making an appearance) as well as old clips, etc. It's no "Twist of Fate" but it'll

Pearl Street sold; Gordon leaves Veruca

COURTESY CHRISTY BUSH

Nina Gordon (top left) makes headlines for her exit from Veruca Salt, made up of Steve Lack, Stacy Jones, and Louise Post.

By Kevin Monahan & Marty Keane
Collegian Staff

In a move designed to help the ailing Pearl Street Nightclub in Northampton, the venerable rock club has been sold. The sale means the venue will be closed for an undetermined length of time while the new management restructures. Unfortunately, the club's calendar has been cleared, meaning upcoming shows by Rocket From the Crypt and The Cramps have been cancelled. Stay tuned for more details.

Nina Gordon, guitarist/vocalist for the hard-pop rock band Veruca Salt, has left the band to pursue her "own vision" according to manager Cliff Burnstien. "It's tough having a band with two people who act as equals but who don't co- write the songs," Burnstien said in an interview with Addicted To Noise. It is not known whether or not the other creative half of Veruca Salt, Louise Post will continue with the band. Drummer Stacy Jones is keeping busy touring with his old band, Letters to Cleo.

Upset with false rumors being spread on the internet, free speech advocate Marilyn Manson is endorsing censorship on the Web. "Because [the rumors were] on the internet, people believed it, which is really strange and dangerous," Manson has said. Some of the allegations include that Manson encouraged his fans to kill kittens and engage in sex acts during his live performances. And he is upset about this?

A tribute album to '70s pop icons Big Star called Big Star Small World featuring Juliana Hatfield, Teenage Fanclub, Afghan Whigs, and Matthew Sweet among others.

Oasis brat Liam Gallagher was charged with assaulting a fan in Brisbane, Australia last week. The tragedy of the story is that he was released on $6,600 bail. The singer is due back in court in June for this incident, and still faces a court date for trashing the main terminal of Glasgow Airport in Scotland last December.

News flash: Billy Corgan's head has swelled to gargantuan proportions. Even before the release of their new album Adore, The Smashing Pumpkins have announced their plans to record the "greatest rock album ever." Pumpkins co-manager Cliff Burnstien (see above) said, "The next one knocks it right out of the fin' universe. Billy's going for the whole fin' world, man." Can't wait for it, man. The lesson to be learned — never underestimate the ambitions, or ego, of Billy Corgan.

Start planning your summer concert itinerary. Already confirmed for major cross-country jaunts are: The Cure, Celine Dion, Rod Stewart, The Spice Girls, Alanis Morrissette, Depeche Mode, Tori Amos, and Emmylou Harris. Considering the already announced tour of Pearl Jam (who play the Meadows in Hartford on Sept. 13 and Great Woods on Sept. 15!), an improved Lilith Fair line-up featuring the superb Misay Elliott, and this summer's concert season looks like a winner.

No word yet on possible names for other big package tours like Lollapalooza or Smokin' Grooves but this summer's H.O.R.D.E. is planning a return to their neo-hippie roots. Unfortunately, this means that John Popper's baby will feature plenty of long-winded jam bands. Already confirmed in fact are his own band, Blues Traveler, and Canada's Barenaked Ladies.

do. What they should do is air a slightly more racy episode of the soap, kind of like "GH" meets "NYPD Blue."

The Daytime Emmy nominations will be broadcast this Wednesday on "Good Morning America" (yeah!) so set your VCR's. I'd watch them in the flesh but there's no way I'm waking my sorry butt up at even in the morning. Will Susan Lucci get that Emmy or even a nod? Regardless, I'm sure I'll have a mouthful to say when we return from our glorious break (Cynthia Watros and Eileen Davidson better get a nod or they'll be hell to pay).

Sink or Swim:

Sink:

• Neil on "Y&R," stop being such a moron. Dru's better off without the grump at this point.

• Once again to the "loy" saga on "All My Children" ... could care less who this woman is. These theatrics of her's aren't helping either. What a drama queen.

• The constant teasing of Maurice's (Sonny) return to "GH." How many soap mags have splashed "Maurice returning to GH" all over the front page. Enough already. Put up or shut up!

• After watching a week's worth of "Bold and the Beautiful" I'm happy to report that, with the exception of Sheila, the show is still lame and by no means am I picky. I used to watch "Model's Inc" for crying out loud.

Treading water:

• The saga concerning Reva's clone on "Gulding Light." Anyone else get a kick out of Friday's cliffhanger, our first glimpse of Reva 2, a la Jesus. Oh, it's going to be a long few months but hey , at least it'll be good for a laugh... right guys? Ok, maybe not. Longtime "GL" fan Cathy has informed me that she will no longer be watching.

Swim:

• Annie on "Sunset Beach." You gotta love the woman... she's has absolutely "no regrets," no conscience either.

• Nik and Robin on "GH." These two are so hot. Finally the show throws him a woman with a personality and some spunk (did you catch her confrontation with Stefan?). "GH" has the quadrangle of the year with Carly/Jason/Nik/Robin. It's about to get a lot steamier in Port Charles.

• "As The World Turns,", after a year of crap, has finally found its footing and is blossoming into one of daytime's crowning achievements. I can't seem to get enough of it these days. For those of you who are interested in trying out a new soap, this is the one to watch. Need a reason? Try Jack and Carly for starters.

porno king, and the rich Lebowski himself become suspects in the crime. Meanwhile, The Dude is good at nothing but being suckered and tormented (the film's funniest scene involves a bloodthirsty ferret and a bathtub). Bridges plays the role with incredible assurance; his transition from extreme casualness to stress is one of the funniest parts of a movie with plenty to laugh at.

All the actors are extremely comfortable in their roles, especially John Goodman, so wasted in Blues Brothers 2000, but right in his element here. The Coens originally wrote the movie with Goodman in mind, and it shows — the character of Walter, a war vet who can't say anything without mentioning Vietnam, is The Dude's macho sidekick. Walter, a converted Jew, stays inactive on Saturday unless it's an emergency. In this case, emergencies usually involve bowling.

Also shining in smaller roles are Steve Buscemi, as a dumb bowling partner who's never able to finish a sentence, and the wonderful John Turturro as the splashy sex offender Jesus Quintana. It's roles like Jesus that have actors lining up to be in Coen movies — these supporting characters could easily carry a movie of their own.

Each character has a separate personality, stuck in their own little world — worlds which collide when brought together. The Dude still lives in the 70's; Walter can't forget Vietnam and mimics lines from George Bush's Gulf War speeches.

The Coen brothers sometimes get lost in their own plotting, because the entire movie is a mega-collection of wild ideas and situations. They do, however, have a great ear for dialogue; meanwhile, Joel Coen's directing style is visually engaging — plenty of style and good timing, sparked with little touches like a point-of-view shot from inside a bowling ball.

The Big Lebowski is narrated by an old cowboy (Sam Elliot) who can't really keep is train of thought going. But he does suggest what the film might be about — strange people caught in strange times. Or maybe it's just about nothing at all. Either way, the Coens throw curves and still manage to bowl a high score. A– and penalty prone tactics inherent to his defenseman the past four years. Truthfully, the New Milford, Conn. native has had maybe four or five "true" stay-at-home defenseman to support him in his tenure.

UMass coach Joe Mallen will remember each and every save his stalwart has made for him, because Regan has been the main reason for his team's success.

"Brian made over 3,000 saves, and he made over 3,000 memories," Mallen said. "He was the main factor in our biggest victories that both our fans, players and coaches will remember for a lifetime.

"This senior class were the building blocks of our program because they were the first class to play four years in Hockey East. This class were the building blocks, but Brian Regan was the cornerstone."

This has been an up and down season for the senior goalie, and for a month or so, Regan was sharing time with freshman Markus Helanen. He was a HE All-Rookie Team selection in his inaugural campaign, and expectations were high for the next three years.

In the last five games of this season, Regan has broken the 30-save barrier four times, including 77 saves in the home- and-home series against No. 3 Boston University, and a 38- save effort in the 4–3 upset of No. 6 New Hampshire two weeks ago. Last Saturday night, even though five goals went past Regan, the crash-the-net offensive style of the Black Bears shielded at least two of those tallies from the senior's eyesight.

Last season, a HE quarterfinal record of 55 saves against UNH was the reason why the Minutemen were competitive against the highly favored Wildcat squad. While in his career, the biggest win of the reinstated program, a 4–2 upset of then-No. 1 Maine on Jan. 28, 1995, Regan was the brick wall again with 51 saves.

But in the end, this is the end for Regan in a Minuteman uniform. A pro career rests on the horizon for him, possibly with the team which drafted him in the 10th round of the 1992 NHL draft, the Carolina Hurricanes.

That will be something to see.

vinclingly, 13–4.

"Mike is a great finisher," said Cannella. "He worked extremely hard in the off–season to be where he is today. You can see the difference from last year."

Janowicz's five scores matched the career–high he set last weekend against Holy Cross.

Senior co–captain Mike DelPercio, the team's leading returnee offensively, did his part, posting four unassisted goals and an assist, while the defensive players were their old selves, holding a Fairfield's (1–2) offense to four goals.

Goalie John Kasselakis had nine saves on 32 shots. The UMass defense was anchored by seniors Harold Drumm, Mike Hanna and Jamie Doherty.

The teams got off to a low–scoring start, with DelPercio recording the game's first goal with six minutes remaining in the first period. Janowicz fired a low ball that got by Fairfield goaltender Tom Brandel to make the score 2–0.

The Minutemen (2–0) gave Fairfield numerous opportunities to pick apart the UMass defense. Six first–half penalties amounted to only two goals for the Stags. The Stags put on the board halfway through the second period after Kasselakis got hit for a slashing penalty, requiring backup Tom Gilligan to man the cage. Forty–eight seconds later, Fairfield's Mike Keegan put one past Gilligan.

"We had a couple of dips in concentration," Cannella said. "We were a man down way too much. Against the type of schedule we are going to face, you cannot afford to be a man down."

In total, the Minutemen were penalized eight times for 6:30, but the Stags were able to capitalize only once. DelPercio scored what turned out to be the game–winning goal when he intercepted a pass behind the UMass net, drove the length of the field and rifling one into the back of the net.

Junior Mike McKeefrey rounded out first half scoring, receiving a pass from DelPercio in front of the net and bouncing it past Brandel.

Fairfield's J.T. Groarke opened up the scoring in the second half, cutting the lead to four, on an assist by Keegan. UMass countered by netting five uncontested goals, including two by Janowicz, to put the game out of reach.

"We were afraid they were going to come back like they did against Hartford," DelPercio said. "Offensively, the young guys really played well."

The Minutemen out–shot Fairfield, 32–26, a big difference from last year's whopping 66–13 advantage in the shot column.

The Minutemen return to action on Tuesday afternoon when they square off against the Hartford Hawks at 3 p.m. at Richard F. Garber Field. The Hawks were defeated by Fairfield earlier in the year, 13–11, but gave the Minutemen a scare last year, losing 7–4.

"Hartford should be ready to go against us," Cannella said. "They have been talking about beating us since the last time we met."

extended season.

It's a happy ending for the Minutewomen. Things were looking pretty dismal for UMass back in December, when it hit a slump after losing leading scorer Kelly Van Huisen to a torn anterior cruciate ligament (ACL). But the Minutewomen pulled themselves together, ending the season with an eight game winning streak, including going undefeated in the month of February.

"We went through a real low period, and we had trouble getting back on track," said freshman guard Kara Trent. "But we came together and we believed, and we felt like no one could beat us."

"Kara Tudman and Sabriya Mitchell willed their attitude on everyone," coach Joanie O'Brien said. "For those two to have a chance to keep playing, that's what makes it special for me."

After the celebrating was over, the team admitted to knowing little about its opponent. But it didn't seem to matter last night.

"Right now I'm still in the NCAA haze," Tudman said.

"I think we were rewarded for that."

Last season, an inexperienced Minutemen squad was bounced from the opening round of the tourney by Louisville. However, Flint sees a lot of positive changes in this season's team.

"Some of the guys were out of it a little. You could see it in their faces," Flint said. "A lot of the games, we were scared. But [this year] the guys who have been there before can talk to the younger guys and help them out."

As for a possible date with Kentucky, Flint says UMass is not looking ahead but considers its end of the bracket a tough one.

"They're [Kentucky] not pressing as much as they used to in the past," Flint said. "We'll talk about that on Saturday, though."

It was no surprise which four teams were rewarded with No. 1 seeds. The Duke Blue Devils will play In the South Region. The North Carolina Tar Heels are in the East Region. The Kansas Jayhawks are located in the Midwest Region, and the Arizona Wildcats will play in the West.

■ hockey

The Minutemen (6–24–3, 3–19–2 in Hockey East) got off to a quick start at the 1:12 mark of the game on a goal by Nick Stephens. Senior forward Dan Juden then put UMass up, 2–0, at 7:05 on a beautiful goal in which he slid the puck through the legs of a Maine defenseman and went top shelf on Alfie Michaud.

Maine, however, knotted things back up at 2–2 in a span of 1:31 midway through the period on goals by Bobby Stewart and Dan Kerluke.

Dean Stork netted his third of the year at 0:22 of the second period on a wrist shot from the left point, but Maine responded right back on a Shawn Wansbourough goal at 1:50 of the middle stanza.

Kris Wallis put UMass ahead once again, at 4–3, later in the second on the power play, when he lifted the loose disc over a fallen Michaud at 12:31, but once again Maine battled back, as Cory Larose evened the game at 19:13 of the second on a wrister from the left face–off circle.

The shootout continued in the third period, when Dean Campanale broke in on Michaud and lifted one under the left shoulder of the Maine netminder to give UMass a 5–4 advantage. Sure enough, Maine came back again, as Robert Ek blasted a slap shot from the left point past a screened Regan, who recorded his 3,000th career save in the contest, to complete the scoring.

Neither team was able to net the winner in overtime, and the Minutemen fell just short of a post–season berth.

"I think that playing right down to the last second of the season was unbelievable," Mallen said. "We did take at least some points from five Hockey East teams, but we would've like to have taken a lot more."

The final result not only signified the end of the season for UMass, but also the collegiate careers of Tom O'Connor, Regan, Tim Lovell, Campanale, Juden, Chris Fawcett, Ryan Furness and Mike Gaffney.

"You have to look at this senior class as one of the building blocks of this entire program. They were the first class to play four years in Hockey East," Mallen said.

■ side

"Hopefully Mike can do the same things Chris Grande was able to do last year," Cannella said. Grande stepped up from being a role player to one of UMass' most consistent scorers.

Together DelPercio and Janowicz have provided an instant spark to a Minuteman lineup which lost five of its top six scorers to graduation. Together they combine the experience of the older players and potential of the younger players into a potent offensive weapon.

This weekend at home against Fairfield, it was DelPercio who started the scoring. With a hard shot that sailed over Stag goalie Tom Brandel's right shoulder with six minutes remaining in the first quarter, the Minutemen led, 1–0. With just over two minutes on the clock in the same period, Janowicz answered with a low shot past Brandel for a 2–0 lead.

Janowicz opened the second quarter with a move that belied his youth, a behind the back shot to the low corner of the Fairfield goal to beat Brandel on his left side. But DelPercio took the lead in the pair's unofficial goal–scoring contest with two more late in the period.

Neither found the net in the third quarter, but Janowicz went on a tear late in the game, scoring three times in the final period. DelPercio finished with four goals after finding the net one final time in the fourth.

"I love it when Mike scores," DelPercio said of Janowicz. "As long as we put the other team away."

Still, Janowicz's youth shined through, as he racked up unnecessary penalty minutes throughout the game.

"Mike made us happy and angry today," Cannella said. "He scored and finished well, but he also lost his focus. He has to learn that you have to be mentally ready for 60 minutes. Of course it is only his second game, really."

And Cannella realizes that with game experience comes game intelligence, which potentially bodes well for Janowicz, because he and DelPercio will be two key ingredients to UMass' season.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20)— You will find that more depends on you at this time than you had expected, and every decision you make will have a far–reaching impact.

ARIES (March 21–April 19)— Take the time to prepare fully for what lies in store for today. You mustn't make the mistake of thinking that you can handle anything right away.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20)— Listen to what you say today, but more importantly, listen to how you say it. You may get all the wrong reactions simply by your tone of voice.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20)— Family matters will take the focus today and one relative in particular is likely to demand more attention from you than any other. Give it!

CANCER (June 21–July 22)— Protect yourself more carefully from threats coming from the outside today. Environmental influences are likely to be felt for some time.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22)— What you do today must be more in the interest of a loved one than of yourself. The more generous you are, the more you will be rewarded.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22)— You may encounter a conflict at home that requires you to walk on both sides of an emotional fence. You can do it; take your time.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22)— You can prevent others from causing a great deal of emotional damage today by insinuating yourself into an argument and playing mediator.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21)— You will want to see just how much you can do in one day, but take care that you're not just spinning your wheels. You must be productive.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21)— Those around you may be a little more reactive and irritable than you had counted on today, so you're going to have to tread lightly.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19)— You can make up for a recent loss by doing things today in a manner that attracts new attention and new commitment to your cause.

AQUARIUS (Jan 20.–Feb. 18)— Your calendar is filling up, but you must be sure to make time for someone who has been missing you for weeks or even months.

Massachusetts sends pair to NCAA tournaments

Minutemen to face SLU in 1st round

By Corey Peter Goodman
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — The wait is finally over for the Massachusetts men's basketball team, whose fate was revealed last night on CBS's NCAA Selection Show.

The Minutemen were selected as the No. 7 seed in the South Region, and will open up against the No. 10 seed St. Louis Billikens this Friday in Atlanta, Ga.

The announcement wasn't expected to be nearly as dramatic as last season, when UMass was unsure whether or not its 19–13 record would get it into the NCAA field of 64. But the Minutemen's stomachs were no doubt turning last night at Bertucci's in Amherst, when their name was in the second–to–last pairing called.

"I got a little nervous at the end," Massachusetts sophomore Mike Babul said. "But we're in, and that's all that counts now."

If the Minutemen get by the Billikens (21–10), they will play the winner of the No. 2 Kentucky–No. 15 South Carolina St. game on Sunday. This would set up an interesting rematch: the two teams haven't met since their historic bout in the Final Four two seasons ago.

The other side of the Friday/Sunday bracket features No. 3 Michigan and No. 6 UCLA. The Duke Blue Devils are the No. 1 seed in the South and will play Thursday in Lexington, Ky.

Massachusetts coach Bruiser Flint said he's looking forward to coaching opposite of St. Louis coach Charlie Spoonhauer.

"He's one of the best coaches in the country," Flint said. "I only know bits and pieces of his team, but it'll be a tough game."

Four other Atlantic 10 teams were named to the field, including George Washington (No. 9, South), Temple (No. 7, West), Rhode Island (No. 8, Midwest) and Xavier (No. 6, East).

Flint said he was happy to be heading to Atlanta.

"I just didn't want to be close to home," he said. "There are a lot of distractions. But I'm just happy to be back in the tournament."

Massachusetts was also hoping to avoid an eight or nine seed, which would likely pit the Minutemen against a No. 1 seed if they were to advance into the second round.

"What helped, I think, is that we just play 10 home games," Flint said.

Women will face Iowa in first round

AMHERST —"Where are we going?" Alison MacFarland asked.

That was the sophomore guard's question as she and her teammates leaped out of their chairs, screaming, crying and celebrating upon hearing they had been given an at–large bid as the No. 13 seed in the West for the 1998 NCAA tournament.

The Massachusetts women's basketball team is heading to Iowa City, Iowa to face the host team Hawkeyes of the University of Iowa.

UMass is returning to the big dance for the second time in three years, and for the second time in school history. In 1996, it traveled to Storrs, Conn. only to lose in the first round against Michigan State.

The Minutewomen lost their opportunity to earn an automatic bid when they fell to Virginia Tech last week in overtime in the Atlantic 10 final, 66–64. All that was left to do was wait for last night's selection committee's decision. The general consensus was that the A–10 deserved an additional bid besides Virginia Tech and it was to be decided between the regular season East and West champs, UMass and George Washington, respectively.

"During the preseason, you can run me into the ground," senior forward Kara Tudman said. "But this is always the worst week of the season because you have to wait and see."

The Minutewomen's hopes sank when ESPN announced GW as the No. 10 seed in the East Region. The Colonials are slated to play against the No. 7 seed, Georgia. UMass would have to wait until the last bracket was announced.

"My heart dropped when they announced GW," senior guard Sabriya Mitchell said. "I didn't think they'd pick three teams from the A–10. I didn't think they were going to take GW, but they did, and they took us too."

"If you're not in here, you're not going," ESPN's Robin Roberts said in the tense moments before the last region, the West, was revealed.

"When she said that, my heart was just pounding," Mitchell said. "Then when I saw Massachusetts, I didn't see anything else, I just saw Mass, and I was so excited. I didn't know where we were going, who we were playing, what seed we were. I was just excited."

The Minutewomen had prevailed as the room thundered in cheers and chants to the news of their sudden

Men's lacrosse cruises over Fairfield

Offense scores 13 to lift Minutemen to 2nd win

By Brett Mauser

For the 1998 Massachusetts men's lacrosse team — the No. 11 team in the nation — scoring would need to come from other places.

Upon the graduation of five of the top six scorers from last year's NCAA Tournament quarterfinal competing squad, coach Greg Cannella knew that offense would be the X–factor.

Cannella got some positive vibes on Saturday as sophomore Mike Janowicz, who coming into the season had only registered one point in his career, netted five goals, as UMass disposed of Fairfield con-

Janowicz & DelPercio a potent combination

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

In person, Mike Janowicz seems a bit reluctant to fully accept his early season success, preferring to credit his teammates for helping him along. Perhaps it's because he is still growing into his role as an early–season attack standout. Maybe it's because he is young, only a sophomore, and still learning the intricacies of the Massachusetts men's lacrosse system.

On the field, however, Janowicz is a completely different person. Reluctant he is not and the 10 goals he has accrued already this season are a testament to his intensity.

"Mike finished his opportunities today," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "He's young and he has a lot of confidence."

Mike DelPercio has already fully accepted his role In Cannella's system as a leader. He knows what is expected of him as both a senior and a captain. On the field, he provides the strong leadership that he says Cannella expects. His four goals and one assist on the year — a hat trick and an assist Saturday — have come on shots that launch off his stick like rockets with deadly accuracy.

Hockey falls short of playoffs

By Michael Kobylonski
Collegian Staff

Don't blame the Massachusetts hockey team for a lack of effort in its regular season finale against Maine.

The Minutemen went all–out for 65 minutes, knowing the only acceptable result would be a victory. A tie or loss would end the season and allow Merrimack to capture the eighth and final spot in the Hockey East playoffs.

Maine	5
Massachusetts	5

Unfortunately, UMass tied the Black Bears, 5–5, Saturday night at the William D. Mullins Center, and despite an outstanding effort, will now have to regroup for next season.

"For us to get five goals in a Hockey East game was a big deal this year with the way that we've been scoring goals, but to walk away after scoring five goals without a victory is a tough one to swallow," Massachusetts coach Joe Mallen said.

Brian Regan is UM hockey's best goalie ever

Get out your chisel and granite, because it is time to officially carve in stone that Brian Regan is the greatest goaltender in Massachusetts hockey history.

After last Saturday night's 43–save effort in the Minutemen's 5–5 tie with Maine at the William D. Mullins Center, you can put the senior at the top of the list. At the 4:41 mark of the second period, Regan notched career save 3,000 on a shot by Black Bear forward Scott Parmentier, while ending his career with 3,022 saves.

After allowing 10 goals in the last two games, during this unsuccessful stretch run for the final playoff spot in Hockey East, why should he be given the nod?

Regan has been the cornerstone of the Minuteman defense, amidst the din and clamor of converted forwards

Dean Stork scored a goal against Maine Saturday night, but the 5–5 tie wasn't enough to push UMass into the playoffs.

Portuguese investigate illegal AIDS drug use

LISBON, Portugal (AP) — Portugal's health minister ordered an investigation yesterday into whether a clinic is testing a banned AIDS drug using patients recruited through the Internet.

The daily newspaper Diario de Noticias had reported that the drug, Virudene PU58, was being administered illegally by a Portuguese doctor.

Health Minister Maria de Belem Roseira told the Portuguese news agency Lusa that such use of the drug would be a crime that must be investigated.

"All legal measures are going to be taken," to ensure that anyone using it will be punished, she said.

The drug, which some University of Pretoria researchers claim reverses the effects of AIDS, also has been banned in South Africa. That came after a committee of South African medical experts last year criticized the researchers for unauthorized human experiments, for using a toxic substance without proof it worked and for sidestepping peer review in seeking government funding.

WorldCom, MCI ally with Grupo Telefonica

WASHINGTON (AP) — Long-distance companies WorldCom Inc. and MCI Communications Corp. are allying themselves with Spain's largest phone company in an arrangement that replaces British Telecommunications.

WorldCom and MCI, which are planning to merger, would take at least a 10 percent stake in the international unit of Grupo Telefonica, a $15.5 billion company, executives from all three companies said yesterday at a news conference.

That unit called Telefonica Internacional provides phone, cable and wireless services in the fast-growing Latin American market. It operates companies in Chile, Argentina, Peru, Venezuela, Brazil as well as in Puerto Rico.

The Latin American market for all telecommunications service is currently valued at more than $50 billion and is projected to grow to more than $67 billion by 2000, the companies said.

In addition, MCI and Telefonica will create a new joint venture that will develop and market telecommunications products and services for another fast-growing market: Hispanic consumers in the United States and abroad.

Charges against Howe, Pellegrino withdrawn

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Charges against Amy Pellegrino, candidate for Student Government Association (SGA) president and Jeffrey Howe, candidate for student trustee, were withdrawn early yesterday morning, as photographs did not produce evidence to support the charges.

"After the pictures came back and proved our campaign innocent, Jenn's [Casasanto] campaign manager withdrew the complaint against my campaign," Howe said.

"I knew my campaign staff. I knew they wouldn't do that," Pellegrino said.

Pellegrino and Howe's campaign workers were accused by former presidential candidate Jennifer Casasanto, of tearing down her campaign posters. The charges were supported by photographs allegedly taken of someone identified as being from the Pellegrino, Howe campaign tearing down posters.

After a frantic search, a photo lab was found and the pictures were developed early this morning revealing two negatives. One was blown up to show a person from the back walking down a hallway.

"The picture was of the back of a person from about 15 feet away walking down the middle of the hall not even touching anything," Howe said.

"There was nothing, absolutely nothing on the negatives," Pellegrino said. "The people on my election committee were like 'this was such a waste of time.'"

The other negative was inspected under a magnifying glass by Chancellor of Elections Carlos Alvarez. This photo showed a person from behind, walking out a door.

"The other [negative] was just a guy walking out the door so I didn't feel the need to develop it. I looked at the other negative under a magnifying glass," Alvarez said.

Although the allegations made against Pellegrino and Howe were not proven, they feel the attention given to the alleged scandal will hurt their campaign.

"Even though it will come out that nothing happened people are still going to read it and it does raise doubts," Pellegrino said.

"I have gotten completely trashed simply because Jenn [Casasanto] is on a rampage," Howe said.

Pellegrino and Howe are also concerned because the charges were made public on the first day of the elections.

"More people vote the first day. So I would say it hurt my campaign and there's nothing to substantiate my story until tomorrow [Tuesday]," Howe said.

"When you're at this point in an election every minute, every second, every hour can mean the difference between winning or losing...voter turnout in Franklin [dining common] was really high. I'm just going on numbers I've been hearing but 200 students voted in Franklin and 150 in Berkshire," Pellegrino said.

Despite withdrawing the charges Cassasanto feels the trial with the Elections Commission was not handled properly.

"Carlos said you had to witness it. We witnessed it...I don't think it's fair they didn't even consider his [photographer of people allegedly taking down posters] testimony," Casasanto said.

After the elections the senate needs to ratify the elections. If the senate does not ratify the elections then they will be held again.

Jennifer Casasanto, who was also the target of accusations which nullified her candidacy Sunday night is appealing the elections which would nullify the elections.

"I filed a petition with the judiciary to have the elections nullified," Casasanto said.

Even without Casasanto's petition the senate can still vote to nullify the elections.

Pellegrino feels despite the controversies during this election the senate will ratify it.

"I doubt it's going to be thrown out. She [Casasanto] was just looking around and waiting," Pellegrino said.

Alvarez is against the senate nullifying the elections saying it would be "stupid."

"I think it would be very stupid to nullify the elections," Alvarez said.

Cassasanto's candidacy was nullified Sunday night during a trial with the elections commission after two charges were brought against her.

The actual charge Casasanto was found guilty of was putting up an

Misunderstanding may cut access to oil supply

By Louis Meixler
Associated Press

ABOARD THE USS INDEPENDENCE — Iranian naval aircraft fly by the USS Independence every few days, monitoring the carrier and reminding Washington that Tehran's navy is the other big force in the Persian Gulf.

For the past few years, Iran has been beefing up its navy, using scarce resources to buy missiles, patrol boats, submarines and anti-shipping mines. While not considered a serious threat to the U.S. 5th Fleet, Iran's navy would be capable of temporarily choking off the Straits of Hormuz, through which 20 percent of the world's oil passes.

"The Iranian navy is a navy to be reckoned with," said Rear Adm. Charles W. Moore, Jr., commander of the two U.S. aircraft carrier battle groups in the Gulf. "I'm very impressed with them."

The Iranian naval buildup, many expert say, is designed to counter the U.S. fleet and add to the country's prestige as a regional power.

The Iranians are "showing that they are an impressive power in their own right that is not to be trifled with," said William Hopkinson of the Royal Institute of International Affairs in London.

There is a buildup in...capabilities, and it does mean that the near monopoly that the 5th Fleet has is being eroded," he added.

Though much updating remains to be done, Iran took delivery early last year of its third Kilo-class submarine from Russia. It also has modified some patrol boats to carry the Chinese-made C-802 anti-shipping missile, which flies low to avoid radar detection. Experts believe Iran also has about 100 shore-to-ship Silkworm missiles, also made in China.

Iran's arsenal of mines includes modern devices from China that sit on the bottom of the sea and shoot up when they detect passing ships. It has an estimated 2,000 older mines that are easy to detect and would slow traffic in the crowded Gulf to a crawl if planted.

Patrick Clawson, an analyst with the Washington Institute for Near East Policy said Iran has layered systems of simple weapons and a clear strategy: "If anyone attacks them, they are going to shut down the straits."

Iran's 150 miles of Gulf coastline mean Tehran scrutinizes U.S. efforts to ensure a stable Gulf.

"They're interested in what is going on off their coastline, just like we would be off of California," said Mark Milliken, captain of the Independence, which was passing 40 miles off the Iranian shore.

Unable to seriously challenge U.S. forces, Iran seems to have concentrated on gaining the ability to disrupt the world's oil flow.

The freeze in U.S.-Iranian relations since the 1979 Islamic revolution in Iran has thawed just a bit since last year's election of President Mohammad Khatami, a relatively moderate voice in the leadership.

However, should tensions escalate between the two governments, Iran is capable of threatening the oil supply — "something that is very important to the United States,"the Gulf states and actually to the whole world," said Seth Cerus of the National Defense University in Washington.

Serb power protested in Yugoslavia

By Dusan Stojanovic
Associated Press

PRISTINA, Yugoslavia — Ethnic Albanians staged their biggest protest in a decade yesterday to condemn Serbia's deadly crackdown in Kosovo. The United States and five other foreign powers imposed new sanctions to try to halt the violence.

"All we need are weapons to fight the Serb power," declared one of the roughly 50,000 protesters, architecture student Visar Bajraktar.

Ethnic Albanians said yesterday that at least 82 people, including 14 women and 12 children, old men and entire families, died in the second of two police sweeps last week through Kosovo, an increasingly tense province where ethnic Albanians outnumber Serbs 9-to-1.

"The Serb regime has committed an atrocity," said Enver Maloku, spokesman for the ethnic Albanians' Kosovo Information Center.

His account and casualty toll could not be independently confirmed. The official toll from last week's two sweeps of villages west of the capital, Pristina, included 46 Albanians and six Serb policemen killed.

Brushing aside foreign criticism, the Serbs say they had to crack down on a militant group known as the Kosovo Liberation Army, which has claimed 50 killings in the past 19 months, and crush Kosovo's attempts to win independence from Serbia, the dominant republic of Yugoslavia.

Kosovo was the heartland of Serbia's medieval empire, and Serbs vow they will never give it up.

"Seeds of Peace" teaches students about "logical peace"

By Elana Premack
Collegian Staff

Discussing the effects of Arab–Israeli animosity on their lives as young people, four Middle Eastern students gathered in the Student Union Ballroom on Thursday evening to present, "Transforming Hatred: Sowing the Seeds of Peace In the Middle East," a program sponsored by the University of Massachusetts Office of Jewish Affairs.

Abdasalam al–Khayyat, from Nablus, West Bank, Shani Raz–Silbiger, from Jerusalem, Israel and Shouq Tarawneh, from Amman, Jordan, lived together during the summer of 1997 at a peace encampment in Maine participating in the "Seeds of Peace" program. The fourth member of the student panel, Samir el–Samman, from Cairo, Egypt, participated in the program during the summer of 1993 and is now a student at Boston University.

"Seeds of Peace" was founded by a journalist in 1993 as a program bringing student leaders from Egypt, Israel and Palestine together in an attempt to begin resolving some of the conflicts between the people of these countries. Since the program was founded, its base of countries has expanded to include Jordan, Morocco, Tunisia and Qatar.

"'Seeds of Peace' gives them a chance to create their own new reality," Meredith Katz, the Associate Executive Director of "Seeds of Peace," said.

The students involved represent a new generation of people working toward peace. Office of Jewish Affairs Director Larry Goldbaum said it is the young people's responsibility for peace; a peace "that surpasses and transforms the hatred that their generation has known."

"Today, the peace process symbolized by the [Yitzhak] Rabin–[Yasser] Arafat handshake and the Camp David Accords signed 20 years ago seems all but dead," Goldbaum said.

Serving as a catalyst for creating a new brand of peace are the lives and experiences of the "Seeds of Peace" participants. Sharing such experiences with others is the first part of the plan for peace.

Al–Khayyat spoke about how living in Nablus, the "city of demonstration," affected his feelings about participating in "Seeds of Peace."

"How can I sleep and eat and discuss sensitive issues with my enemy, an Israeli boy or an Israeli girl?" al–Khayyat said.

After a conflict resolution session, termed facilitated co– existence by the program, during which he was involved in an argument with an Israeli girl, al–Khayyat unapproved poster.

"I admit it. I didn't get that poster checked. But I wasn't being sneaky about it," Casasanto said.
The other charge brought by Eleanor Court, candidate for student trustee, which was the main point of debate involved current student trustee Brian Tirrell running in the election just long enough to give the money allotted to him for running a campaign to Casasanto.
Court brought the charges after noticing discrepancies between Tirrell's actions and what he had said to Court concerning whether he was running in the elections or not.
"Brian took out papers when the nominations opened... Then [later in the week] I asked Jenn if they were running together and she said 'yeah it's still up in the air but we're running together.' Then I got a note in my mailbox. It was a paper all about the rules and responsibilities of being trustee and a note was attached that said 'I thought this would help you. You better win, Brian.' This indicated to me that he wasn't running."
Court said she then spoke to Tirrell on the phone and he said he wasn't running.
"I called him and he said 'I'm not running. I'm turning my nomination in.'"
Casasanto explains the reason Tirrell dropped out was due to personal conflict.
"We had personal problems throughout the time we were campaigning together," Casasanto said.
Court said after a week Tirrell had not had his name on any posters and had not accessed his campaign money.
"He had not been anywhere on the posters and he hadn't accessed any of his money," Court said.
When questioned about the many posters with her name and the lack of posters with Tirrell's name on them, Casasanto said they were for her name recognition.
"We made name recognition for him and we had name recognition for me," Casasanto said.
Court goes on to say that a week later Tirrell's contradictions made her confront him and he admitted he only ran to give Casasanto more money for her campaign.
"I went upstairs to find out what was going on. I said 'Brian you are dropping out of the elections tomorrow right?' He said 'yes this is true.' But I just talked to Lia and she said she signed a P.O. for Jenn with your name on it. He said 'This is also true.'...I said 'So your going to put your name on the poster to get the money for Jenn then drop out?' He said yeah and he was kind of laughing like it was a joke." Court said.
Casasanto refutes this account saying the P.O. form was for Tirrell only.
"He filled out the P.O. form. It was his P.O. form.," Casasanto said.
Casasanto said all the money was used for both their campaigns.
"All the money we spent, we spent together," Casasanto said.

was able to come one step closer to walking the path to peace.
"Before she is an Israeli, she is a human being like me," al-Khayyat said.
Raz-Silbiger had never seen an Arab participate in the "Seeds of Peace" program, but she decided to join the program despite fear of the unknown.
"I was going to have to do something I don't do every day, something that isn't realistic," Raz-Silbiger said.
In time her stereotypes faded away and she realized that Arabs her age are not to be blamed for the events in the Middle East.
"During the bombing in Israel, I felt the need to tell them that they're not guilty," Raz-Silbiger said.
Tarawneh spoke of reaching what she called a "logical peace," a peace whereby history is understood. Part of understanding history is separating the role of the individual and the role of a country's government.
"I was always asking why you did this, not why your government did this," Tarawneh said.
El-Semman recognized that the problems in the Middle East cannot be solved with any finality through the "Seeds of Peace" program.
"What can 13 and 14 year-old boys do to make peace?" el- Semman said. "You can't solve a problem going back so many years in just three weeks."
After going through the program, the students returned to their home communities to exercise what they gained from their experiences.
"The main challenge was being accused of not being loyal to your country," el-Semman said.
Despite the challenges presented by a mission to begin working toward peace for a new generation, the participants in the "Seeds of Peace" program have hope.
"If we all do our little part and other people do their little parts, peace is the sum of the parts," el-Semman said.

Maloku said some ethnic Albanians managed to view bodies of those killed while they were in Pristina morgue. Police moved the bodies Sunday evening to the town of Srbica, the center of last week's crackdown, about 25 miles west of Pristina.
Associated Press photographers managed to get into Srbica, which was heavily patrolled by police, for a brief look at a construction yard where dozens of bodies — covered with one long white sheet with heads and legs protruding — were lined up in two rows. A tractor lumbered through the rain, dumping another corpse. Police allowed the APTV crew to film only one body. The Serbs claimed he was Adem Jashari and identified him as the leader of the Kosovo Liberation Army.
The corpse appeared to be the same man who has been pictured in Serbian media in recent days. Police previously had turned back reporters trying to reach Srbica.
Relatives were refusing to pick up the bodies, demanding autopsies by internationally appointed forensic experts, Maloku said.
He said the Serbs were anxious to hold funerals today and accused them of wanting to cover up their alleged crimes. Serb sources denied that, saying they want burial only because bodies are beginning to decompose.
For the first time since restive Kosovo was stripped of autonomy in 1989, police did not interfere with yesterday's 50-minute protest, flashing victory signs and waving banners demanding outside intervention.
Heavily armed riot squads sat in buses in side streets, and police with submachine guns and bulletproof vests formed cordons but did not break up the crowd. "We got orders from Belgrade not to beat them," said a policeman who insisted on anonymity. A similar protest in Pristina last week ended with riot police lobbing tear gas and clubbing demonstrators as they ran.

Serb found guilty in war crime trial

By Mike Corder
Associated Press

THE HAGUE, Netherlands — A Bosnian Serb pleaded guilty yesterday to raping four Muslim women in an eastern Bosnian town in 1992. It marked the first time an international court won a conviction treating rape — in and of itself — as a war crime.
Dragoljub Kunarac pleaded guilty to a crime against humanity. He is only the third suspect convicted by the U.N. court prosecuting atrocities the former Yugoslavia — and the first convicted of rape. A war crimes court in Tokyo after World War II included rape in a series of offenses allegedly constituting crimes against humanity, but this was the first conviction in a case dealing exclusively with rape as a war crime.
Kunarac, 37, faces a maximum sentence of life imprisonment. He pleaded innocent to three torture charges related to his alleged participation in what prosecutors called a systematic Serb campaign of sexual assault in the town of Foca.
After the brief hearing, Kunarac's attorney Slavisa Prodanovic said Kunarac "pleaded guilty because he feels guilty...He knows he can trust the tribunal 100 percent" to treat him fairly. Kunarac, unshaven and wearing a dark suit and tie, apparently took the tribunal by surprise with his guilty plea. There was no immediate word on when he would be sentenced.
Judges scheduled a hearing for today to give prosecutors time to decide whether to drop the three other charges to avoid a lengthy and costly trial.
International human rights observers have accused forces in the Bosnian conflict of using the systematic rape of women as a weapon to terrify and traumatize ethnic groups.
According to his 1996 indictment, Kunarac raped four women captured after rebel Serbs overran Foca. He also was accused of beating female prisoners and allowing them to be gang-raped by members of a paramilitary unit he commanded.
The beatings and the surrender of women to be raped by others were covered in the three torture counts to which Kunarac pleaded innocent.
In one incident, the indictment said Kunarac raped one woman and left another, identified by the code name FWS-75, at the mercy of his men.
"For about three hours, FWS-75 was gang-raped by at least 15 soldiers...They sexually abused her in all possible ways," the indictment said.

American trust in government rising

By Nancy Benac
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Americans' cynicism toward their government appears to be softening.
The percentage of people who trust the federal government is up sharply from two years ago, though the figure is still low, according to an in-depth survey released yesterday. In addition, two-thirds of Americans have favorable opinions of federal workers and most are giving government agencies better marks than in the past.
Most Americans described themselves as frustrated with the government but not angry at it, according to questions posed by the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press.
Overall, 39 percent of Americans said they trust the federal government to do the right thing at least most of the time, up 18 percentage points from the all-time low in 1994, according to the center's main survey last fall.
Not even this year's allegations of a presidential affair and cover-up did much to shake the improved view of government by a public that has grown accustomed to scandal, according to the center's more recent polling. The trust figure slipped to 34 percent in a follow-up February poll.
"There's a moderation of discontent with government which is pretty consistent and across the board," said Andrew Kohut, director of the center. "They may be distrustful of government, but there's not a lot of hate."
The survey suggested that distrust of Washington is driven by two principal factors: discontent with the honesty of public officials, and dissatisfaction with the way the government does its job.
Meanwhile, Americans' satisfaction with their own lives is at a 30-year high, reflecting the strong economy.
Even as Americans gave the government dismal performance ratings overall, 69 percent had a favorable opinion of government workers. And public opinion is up or holding steady for 14 of 17 federal agencies since the 1980s.
The only significant declines in public opinion were for the IRS, FBI and Veterans Affairs Department.
Confidence in government plummeted in the 1960s during the Vietnam War and continued to fall in the 1970s in response to Watergate, dropping again after the Iran-Contra affair in the 1980s.
The low point came in 1994, when just 21 percent of Americans said they trusted the federal government to do the right thing at least most of the time. Such anti-government sentiment helped propel the Republican Party to power in Congress that year. Despite the improvement in public opinion since then, "public trust in government can only be described as low," according to the center's report.
But when it comes to the practical impact of that distrust, the center concluded that it has little direct effect on voter turnout, patriotism or respect for the law.
"About as many people would recommend a government job to a child today as would have in the early 1960s, when there was much less distrust of government," it found.
However, the center said, distrust "appears to sour Americans' dialogue with Washington, as reflected in skepticism about whether public officials represent their constituencies."
Further, among the 12 percent of Americans who say they are angry with their government, more than one-third of those can see justifications for violent acts against the government.
The survey also compared Americans' attitudes with those of Europeans, and found that while Americans distrust government a bit more than Europeans, a far greater number of citizens of Europe call politicians themselves untrustworthy.

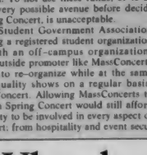
UPC not doing its job

Having cancelled Spring Concert for the second time in three years, University Productions & Concerts (UPC) and the Campus Activities office has once again failed the student body of the University of Massachusetts by not living up to their responsibility to serve the programming needs of students. Part of every student's tuition bill includes a fee for student activities, which is where UPC's budget is derived from. To not use these funds, or to at least not pursue every possible avenue before deciding to cancel Spring Concert, is unacceptable.



There exist no Student Government Association by-laws prohibiting a registered student organization from working with an off-campus organization. Working with an outside promoter like MassConcerts would allow UPC to re-organize while at the same time putting on quality shows on a regular basis, including Spring Concert. Allowing MassConcerts to assist in putting on Spring Concert would still afford UPC the opportunity to be involved in every aspect of putting on a concert; from hospitality and event security to even being able to choose the acts for the show.

We feel working with an outside organization will also help to solve UPC's problem of low participation. Bringing acts like the Mighty Mighty Bosstones and A Tribe Called Quest to campus will undoubtedly spur students to actively get involved with UPC. This will help foster an atmosphere which will better serve both the membership of UPC who want to gain valuable experience in the field of concert promoting and the student body of UMass who have a right to a quality Spring Concert.

In assessing the current membership and financial crunch at UPC, it is clear they do not have the option to work successfully without the help of an outside organization. Simply put, UPC has shown a pattern of not being able to bring top concert attractions to the UMass community which has resulted in these shows being booked at other five college campuses.

What bothers you?

Seth Koenig

There are a lot of things wrong with the world. Your immediate reaction is something to the effect of, "Yeah, obviously. Do you want a medal or a chest to pin it on?" However, the point is what you hear on the evening news isn't the half of it. Really.

Quadruple homicides are wrong, war is wrong, theft is wrong, embezzlement is wrong, and so on and so forth. The news covers all that quite well as a matter of fact, and you will never be at a loss for information on the scum of the planet if you glance at the morning paper. What goes unnoticed are the little injustices that get added to the big ones that make up the total statement, "There are a lot of things wrong with the world." There is just so much more to the word "wrong" than we tend to realize.

Take for instance slow drivers. Not talking about those people who only go five over the speed limit. I'm talking about those geriatric slugs who ride the breaks on a sixty- five mile-per-hour straightaway. You know who I'm talking about. Those people who always seem to pull out in front of you when there's ten feet of space between your car and the one before you, when it would have been three times easier to wait until you've passed because there isn't anyone for miles in your rearview. Then you figure that because they're so antsy to get onto the road that they'll be going a hundred miles an hour, but instead they go about as fast as molasses on a level plane. All this ensues very early in your trip, of course, because these crafty conspirators know that you're probably late. They are usually right. These drivers are a good example of something that's wrong with the world.

Then, of course, there are those "too-close-for-comfort" people in the men's bathroom. Ladies, you'll have to take my word for this one. In the bathroom, there is generally a fairly long row of urinals. The reason that there is such a long row is that people need personal space when doing their business. That's common sense. It's an unwritten rule that if possible, you give a person a one urinal buffer on either side. Now, I know that's not always an option. If the only one free is between two others taken ones, you've got to still use it, but there are people who will take the one next to you even if all the rest are free. I don't like these people. I don't know if these people want to be my best friend, or if they're just curious as to if they compare "sizewise." Either way, they make me uncomfortable, and they, too, are what's wrong with the world.

"Also, contrary to the popular adage, there are stupid questions."

Obviously, my complaining wouldn't be complete without citing those folks who want my money (which, for the record, doesn't really exist, much like unicorns and sea serpents). Phone companies, Whitmore, street merchants, all of them. If you are one of those people trying to extract cash from me, listen carefully, "There isn't any left." I know I owe them all obscene amounts of currency, but constantly annoying me isn't going to make my money tree grow any faster. If I had the money, they'd all be the first to know, but considering I'm broke, they might as well just be patient.

Also, contrary to the popular adage, there are stupid questions. You'll probably hear one today, as a matter of fact. Keep your ears open, and when you have one fired at you, respond with sarcasm and scorn. You'll feel better. Honest.

Luckily, there is hope for the world. With all the wrongs out there, there is one, major, undefeatable right. Yes, that's right, the University of Massachusetts Hoop Band. The folks in the Hoop Band are talented, enthusiastic, and, most of all, funny. Not only do they play great, upbeat songs during the UMass basketball games, they lead the cheering, and mock the opposing coach as well. If that's not multi-talented entertainment at its finest, I don't know what is. How could all be like that; we would never have to do things like threaten to bomb other countries. Unfortunately, with basketball coming to an end, we're doomed to deal with the aforementioned annoyances without the appropriate counterweight.

When next winter rolls around they'll be back, though, because otherwise we'd be faced with certain apocalypse. Let's just hope it doesn't come to that, and keep shaking our fist and swearing at those slow drivers while they're gone. Remember, that's probably what the Hoop Band would do.

Outside promoter needed

I think University Productions and Concerts (UPC) deserves a great big doff of the cap. Really. Good going guys. I know you have dropped the ball before, but never this early. This is big. Thumbs up. In my three years here, there has been one Spring Concert, and it was the first one in the history of the University where the students had to pay. On top of that, it was headlined by G. Love and Special Sauce, who played Amherst not a month before and are always playing the area anyway. Really, great going guys.

Then again, it's not like this is going to hurt anyone. This isn't life or death, the fact that we're not going to have a Spring Concert. Again. But this is what UPC exists for, to give us quality concerts. And they haven't.

Mike Messaros

Judy Gagnon, assistant director of Campus Activities Advising Center, was quoted in the Collegian (March 4): "It would be a mistake for UPC to use their budget to work with an outside promoter who wants to make a profit. Besides, UPC has the ability to book these shows themselves."

Well, that's very altruistic. I'm glad UPC isn't selling their soul to "the Man." Regardless of whether or not I've seen one good concert since I've gotten here, my chest is welling with pride that our grassroots organizations are the last stalwarts of Do-It-Yourself esthetic in concert promotion. But UPC doesn't seem to have the ability to book these shows. Do I have to say it again: one half-ass Spring Concert in three years. Obviously they don't have the ability to book these shows or they would. I've seen concerts at other colleges, but I've yet to see one here.

It's not as if we, as a University, have not sold our souls to "the Man" already. When's the last time you bought a Pepsi from a vending machine on campus? Oh, and is AT&T now a student run business or did I miss something? And of course we can't use our own microwaves, but we've been blessed because we can rent a Microfridge (for a cost over four years that eclipses the price of just buying it). This University should be made into a monopoly board. But, oh, we're so grassroots, we're so very Woodstock.

"This University should be made into a monopoly board."

We're not so unselfish that we cannot take something that is handed to us, quite reasonably, by someone who is, yes, looking to make money. Don't tell me that music is actually an industry, something with businessmen who are trying to make a buck. We should ask what kind of deals are being cut since UMass refuses to work with outside vendors. Where do they draw the line? No outside vendors, but here, have some Surge. In a letter to the editor on March 5th, Scott Conlin, Student Government Association (SGA) Secretary of Public Relations and Policy (along with being a UPC stage crew volunteer — thumbs up, Scott!), urged the student body to support UPC and their ideals, saying that using an outside promoter would be "akin to telling People's Market they aren't doing a good enough job and instead oping for Dairy Mart or Dunkin' Donuts to sell coffee and bagels here." But People's Market is doing their job. They have the coffee and bagels. UPC has bare cupboards.

UPC seems to be an impotent organization that is not getting the job done. They do not deserve our support, and instead deserve a house cleaning. Bring in people who want to put on good concerts, not ones who look forward to their summer internships at Virgin.

Now, I'm no businessman, but I think I know why UPC is struggling. It might be the fact that they don't put on many concerts, and when they do, it doesn't seem to be a band anyone wants to see. My proof is this: there is no Spring Concert. Had they brought in some quality bands, no matter how large or small, there could have been a little money left over to blow on a great package of bands for the end of the year. Do I need a business major to back me up here? Or is this just common sense?

What are my feelings in the end? Disappointment. I feel like an opportunity has been taken out of the hands of the students by people who have misguided ideas and are not acting in accordance with the feelings of the student body.

Once again guys: great job! Can't wait till next year.

Letters to the Editor

Pellegrino for SGA president

To the editor:

Unlike many of the students who will have the opportunity to vote in the Student Government Association elections, I have been an active participant in student leadership at UMass for six years. I look at the list of candidates and I recognize the names, know their record of service and am familiar with their individual methods for student advocacy. I wish I could say that this encourages me, but it does not.

Student leadership has become divisive to such a degree that its representatives no longer have the ability to work effectively. Unfortunately the selection of candidates who have chosen to pursue the responsibility of student president reflects this disjointed structure.

The partisan conflict in our student governance body must stop. While a number of the candidates are qualified, and indeed represent responsible leaders with whom I have worked closely over the years, there is only one who I trust with a divided student body.

The candidate in question, Amy Pellegrino, has suffered unjustly due to support from some of the more conservative factions on campus. Pellegrino is a person of extreme integrity and diligence. While other candidates have equivalent experience, Pellegrino's strength lies in her ability to build bridges between divided groups. This ability to communicate with diverse constituencies and to value differing views on controversial issues makes Pellegrino an ideal candidate in our current campus climate. My experience working with her in student leadership has shown her to be fair, considering arguments on their merits rather than looking at issues based on who brings them forward.

I firmly believe that Amy Pellegrino could become one of the most effective people to ever hold the office of student president at UMass. For those who think Pellegrino's support is solely from conservative elements, think again. As an outspoken liberal who has stood in opposition to the conservatives on campus for many years, I am giving Amy Pellegrino my full endorsement as a candidate for student president.

Vote for Court & Shamapande

To the editor:

As the current governor of Orchard Hill, I would like to express my sincere support for Eleanor Court for student trustee and Salwa Shamapande for president. The trustee and presidency positions are generally considered the highest positions that students can hold, requiring both responsibility and the ability to deal with tough situations.

Court's extensive knowledge of UMass, her experience with the system and her efficiency with producing results clearly qualifies her for this position.

Shamapande was vice president of the Black Student Union, is currently the secretary of University Policy and is a liaison with the Faculty Senate.

Both people are excellent candidates with a clear-cut understanding of the way things work at UMass.

Take MassConcerts' offer

To the editor:

Talk about looking a gift horse in the mouth! It is beyond my scope of reasoning why University Productions and Concerts (UPC) would turn down an offer from an outside vendor to assist in the sponsorship of the spring concert. There seems to be no downside to the deal. The line-up sounds great (even to this not-so-young student), there are no Student Government Association (SGA) by-laws preventing the co-sponsorship, and what's more, MassConcerts is promising that the concert will be free to students.

Unless the appropriate decision makers are living in an academic vacuum, the whole point of attending a university is to prepare for the real world, and what better way than to gain experience from the private sector? I think that it is unfair to the students who participate in the endeavors of such organizations as UPC not to be encouraged to seek out and find workable solutions to organizational problems. Someone who actually does the job as a profession is likely to offer some valuable lessons and assistance in the running of an organization such as UPC.

In fact, a learning environment and structure should be a prerequisite to any agreement with a private vendor. Why take the fatalistic "selling out to private enterprise" view when an opportunity is at hand? Anyway, it would seem that even if UPC were to have the funds they would be unable to organize a concert.

Barriers to equal society exist

To the editor:

I applaud Nicole Lavin's strength in not only vocalizing her viewpoint in class, but following up with a clear and heartfelt editorial in the Collegian (March 6). She is someone who has a stake in this issue and is willing to make herself heard.

I would caution Lavin, however, that her vision of "togetherness" and what an actual representation of a society reflecting all its members' cultures would be are most likely strikingly dissimilar. If the author was willing to concede many traits of a society that are inherently white, she is ready to discuss with greater depth an equal society.

Until many barriers are surmounted, namely multi- lingualism, the United States needs to be a "tossed salad" of distinct cultural flavors and textures.

Put on Spring Concert with local bands

To the editor:

I've been at UMass for three years now, two of which the Spring Concert has been canceled because of dwindling funds. To be quite frank, I've seen bands around here that have a stronger sound than Blues Traveler or Squirrel Nut Zippers could produce on their best day; bands like RKDS, Hip Blaster Monkey and Trick Knee.

It's not too late to have the Spring Concert. Throw up a small stage and ask some local bands who have more of a right to play here in the first place. Respond University Productions and Concerts (UPC).

High court refuses affirmative action case

By Laurie Asseo
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court, increasingly skeptical of efforts to give minorities special help without proof of discrimination, refused yesterday to revive a Florida county's affirmative-action program for awarding construction contracts. The court, without comment, turned away Dade County's argument that discrimination in the local construction industry is severe enough to justify an effort to aid black-owned companies.

The court also declined to hear an appeal by a minority contractors' group that sought to reinstate portions of similar programs in Dade County for companies owned by Hispanics and women. Yesterday's actions were not decisions and therefore set no national precedent.

The justices have strictly limited affirmative-action programs in state and local public works projects since 1989, saying such efforts must be narrowly tailored to remedy the effects of past discrimination.

However, a lawyer for the minority contractors' group said that people should not give up on trying to meet that strict legal standard.

"We know there is discrimination and that it's unfortunately alive and well," said Thomas F. Pepe, who represents the Allied Minority Contractors Association. "It's just that it's very difficult to prove discrimination."

With the proper research on the continuing effects of discrimination, it is possible to win court decisions upholding affirmative action programs, Pepe said.

In 1995, the Supreme Court said federal programs that aim to help minorities must meet the same strict standard required of state and local governments.

The high court also has restricted the use of racial considerations in drawing election districts, while lower courts have cut back on affirmative action in public university admission policies.

But the Republican-led Congress has not done away with every federal affirmative action program. Last week, the Senate voted to keep a 15-year-old federal program that helps women and minorities win highway construction contracts.

In another affirmative-action case yesterday, the justices rejected the appeal of a former Nevada college professor who said she was discriminated against because she is white.

Yvette Farmer said the University of Nevada, Reno, unlawfully hired a black sociology professor before her and paid her less when it hired her later. The university said the black professor was more qualified.

In other action, the court:

- Agreed to decide whether police need a search warrant before peering through a gap in window blinds to detect possibly illegal behavior.
- Ruled that federal copyright law does not protect companies that export their products from having them shipped back by another firm for sale in the United States.
- Set aside a Baltimore man's conviction for a 1993 beating death, ruling he was denied a fair trial because a co-defendant's confession was read to the jury.

The Florida case involved affirmative-action programs adopted in Dade County for black contractors in 1982 and for Hispanic and women contractors in 1994.

The plans set goals for awarding county contracts. The goals could be met by setting aside some contracts for bidding solely by minority-owned firms, requiring contractors to give work to minority subcontractors, or by other measures.

Six construction trade associations challenged the plans in 1994, saying they violated the Constitution's guarantee of equal treatment.

A federal judge ruled that Dade County did not provide enough evidence to support the need for the program. The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals agreed, adding that the county improperly used such remedies as a "first resort" instead of considering neutral measures such as simpler bidding procedures.

The county's Supreme Court appeal addressed only the plan for black-owned businesses.

Letter from the editor

It is a rare opportunity for an editor to address his readers, but this being my first publication at Multicultural Affairs Editor and after much cajoling on my part, my Managing Editor finally succumbed to my pleas and allowed me to use this space to let you know what to expect on this page in the upcoming months (years?).

I propose to adhere to the adage, "variety is the spice of life." That means each fortnight (two weeks) there will be a mixture of news stories, features and hopefully an opinion or two from anyone fearless enough to put pen to paper that highlight the tremendous diversity the University of Massachusetts has been afforded.

"What tremendous diversity?" you might say. Well, although many might contest the percentage of students belonging to "other" cultures on our campus, the fact remains there are students from all the inhabited continents in the world currently studying at UMass (and it seems a few from other worlds as well). Thus, the need to have this space to express stories that are important to these communities as well as reflect their ideals and values.

As a product of different cultural heritages myself (but these days who isn't?) it is with great enthusiasm that I embark on this journey, for it is an expedition into greater cultural awareness that all of us can benefit from.

Hopefully, through greater understanding of each other's idiosyncrasies, both cultural and individual, we will create a spirit of tolerance that will contribute to tearing down the proverbial walls of racism and hatred that still linger on as we close out the second millennium of man's (rather, homo sapiens) modern history.

With that diatribe having been said, and plenty of space still to fill up, I truly hope you the reader enjoy this page, that it stirs your curiosity, that it makes you ask questions or even that some of its content agitates you. The point is, have a reaction, reflect on what is being said; maybe you'll be inspired enough to drop me a line with a comment, criticism or suggestion. Then again, maybe you won't. Apathy is certainly not lonely on this campus.

Ultimately, the Multicultural Affairs page is intended to illustrate what a diverse world we do live in and what a panoply of views there are in it — be they popular or not.

As the last drops of ink on my plume are scratched on this parchment (and this little philippic concludes) I look at the words above and sigh. This is what to expect from here on in?

Pakistani students celebrate cultural heritage

By Meher Singh
Collegian Staff

The Pakistan Students Association (PSA) held its annual cultural show and dinner, Hamara Pakistan (Our Pakistan) Sunday night in the Student Union Ballroom. The evening began with a recitation of the Holy Quran by University of Massachusetts student Ali Hussain, followed by the Pakistani National Anthem.

The show incorporated songs and poetry readings of various Pakistani artists. There was even an energetic "bhangra" dance choreographed by UMass computer science major and event co-host Samir Ahmed, and Aamir Khan, a communications and economics major and President of PSA for 1997-98.

There were other non-traditional acts such as a fashion show which gave insight into the intricate designs and bright colors of Pakistani clothing. One of the acts was a narration by Nabeel Ali, a young Pakistani boy who is an Amherst resident. The event also mixed in a little Western flavor, with UMass students Ari Zuckerman and Ijaz Ahmad doing a folk jam.

Khan was pleased with the overall outcome of the show, although he emphasized that it did take a lot of work.

"Bringing it together was really hard, but it came out well in the end because a lot of people contributed," Khan said. "The venue, especially, was hard to set up."

The PSA is only two years old but active organization. It has been successful with its projects thus far, has received a good response from the student body, and has had a lot of help from the Pakistani community in Amherst.

There were acts in Sunday's show which involved students from the nearby colleges. Nadia Lateef of Amherst College sang a Pakistani song and did a poetry reading. There was also a contribution from a group of Smith College women, who danced to "Dhol Bhajne Lage," a village dance.

As far as future plans go, Khan said "there are currently about 35-40 members, and we're trying to expand this to a Five College deal." The PSA does not limit its events to cultural shows, they also organize lectures, and are planning smaller events for the rest of the semester, such as pizza nights.

According to Khan, "we're planning a concert, but we're not sure about it yet. It may be this semester, or maybe even next semester. Hopefully a Pakistani group will come to perform."

Activist to speak tonight

As part of the ALANA (Asian, Latino, African, Native American) Lecture Series this spring semester, Josette Perard, a Haitian activist for women's rights and the poor, will speak to students today on Globalization and Haiti in the University of Massachusetts Campus Center, Room 101.

Perard is the co-founder of the Lambi Fund, an organization promoting sustainable economic activities, linking United States activists with Haiti's popular movements.

Perard had to go underground, or into exile, twice since the Duvalier and Aristide governments. Both times she has worked to promote projects for political and economic justice. Some of her notable projects include setting up programs which provide women with the resources to access food, fuel and housing.

Perard supervises and manages over 30 popular organizations addressing issues of economic and political justice. She is reputed to be an exceptional orator and inspiring individual who captures the attention of her audiences.
